CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 22, 1914.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, our heavenly Father, with sincere devotion we renew our petitions unto Thee. We thank Thee for the exalted privilege. Thou delightest in the cry of the humble. Give ear therefore, O Lord, unto our prayer. Attend to the voice of our supplications. May we realize our dependence upon Thee. May we not presume upon our own sufficiency. May we hearken unto that wisdom and power that cometh from the Lord, for "in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." Regard, therefore, our effort to draw near to Thee this day, and uphold us with the right hand of Thy righteousness. We ask it for Jesus' sake. Amen.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD CO. (S. DOC. NO. 555).

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the correspondence passed between the President and the Attorney General, and also certain correspondence with Mr. Hustis, president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., touching upon the efforts that have been made to adjust the difficulties of that company and to induce it to conform to the law and the final expression of determination to proceed civilly and criminally against those who have been responsible for the mismanagement and looting of that great interest.

I am sending to the desk copies which have been furnished me by the Attorney General in order that they may appear in the RECORD. They have already been printed in part in the public press, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD, and that they be made a public document in order that we may have them for circulation.

Mr. President, I take this occasion to say that I congratulate the President and the Attorney General in the warmest possible terms for their course of conduct in handling this difficult question and for the patience they have hitherto observed, and I especially congratulate them and the country upon the fact that we are to have the question tried out in court and the law of the country enforced against great lawbreakers.

I am glad, sir, that notice has been served in this way upon the great corporations which exist in violation of our laws that the patience of the Government is exhausted. I am glad that the Government of the United States is at last prepared to show its teeth, and I hope and confidently believe that a policy thus happily inaugurated will be carried on and that at the end we shall be able to say no guilty man has escaped.

I congratulate the Attorney General and the President upon the determined and forceful policy they are about to inaugurate.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed as a document and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD CO.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 21, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I have your letter of to-day, inclosing a copy of your letter of July 9 to Mr. J. H. Hustis, president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., which together disclose the failure of the directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. to comply with the terms of the settlement proposed by them and accepted by us in the matter of their railroad holdings. Their final decision in this matter causes me the deepest surprise and regret. Their failure, upon so slight a pretext, to carry out an agreement deliberately and solemnly entered into, and which was manifestly in the common interest, is to me inexplicable and entirely without justification.

You have been kind enough to keep me fully informed of every step the department took in this matter, and the action of the department has throughout met with my entire approval. It was just, reasonable, and efficient. It should have resulted in avoiding what must now be done.

In the circumstances the course you propose is the only one the Government can pursue. I therefore request and direct that a proceeding in equity be filed, seeking the dissolution of the unlawful monopoly of transportation facilities in New England now sought to be maintained by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., and that the criminal aspects of the case be laid before a grand jury.

With much regard, sincerely, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. J. C. MCREYNOLDS,
Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., July 21, 1914.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Some days since I reported to you that the board of directors of the New Haven Railroad had advised me that they would not carry into effect the approved proposals made by them last winter for bringing the affairs of that company into harmony with the Federal statutes.

Following your direction, I wrote to the president of the company on July 9 expressing your views and my own in opposition to the position assumed by the board. A copy of that letter is attached hereto.

Saturday last I received a request to confer with a committee composed of members of the board on yesterday—Monday. They came here, and we discussed the situation. I emphasized the position of the Government, as outlined in my letter of July 9, and energetically called attention to the results which would necessarily follow adherence to the position taken by them. They refused, however, to admit any obligation to conform to the Massachusetts enactment, and firmly declined to carry into effect their own proposals for an adjustment.

During the past year you have been constantly in touch with my actions in respect of the New Haven road, and you have been good enough to express satisfaction therewith. It seems, however, not inappropriate again to remind you of some aspects of the general situation.

Prior to 1908 the attention of the Department of Justice was called to the unlawful combinations and monopolies in which the New Haven Railroad was the principal party; and in May of that year a proceeding under the Sherman law was instituted, wherein the Government sought to correct certain of the existing evils. This suit was dismissed June 26, 1909. Thereafter the monopoly proceeded to strengthen its hold upon the carriers of New England.

By the time your administration began the New Haven and the Boston & Maine Railroad had been reduced to the unfortunate condition now unhappily too well known; their securities, widely distributed among small investors, had shrunken enormously in value; and the commerce and industries of all New England were under severe strain.

Directly after assuming this office, being convinced that the situation demanded a thorough investigation by capable counsel, I retained Mr. T. W. Gregory, well known to you, and whose ability, industry, and integrity are unimpeachable. In due time he reported the result of his researches, and I instructed him to prepare for filing, at the earliest possible moment, a proceeding in equity to prevent further violations of the law. Before this could be accomplished the railroad company selected a new chief officer, and he earnestly asked to enter upon negotiations with me looking toward an adjustment without the necessity of suit. You have been familiar with the outcome; and, as the terms of the plan agreed on were published, they became generally known.

Because of the important consequences involved directly to New England and mediately to the rest of the Union it seemed most important, first, to accomplish, if possible, a restoration of lawful conditions in the transportation facilities of that section with the least possible further distress to impoverished investors and unsettled industries, and I have acted accordingly.

The criminal aspects of the case have been kept constantly in mind, much data bearing thereon was collected months ago, and care has been exercised to permit nothing which might interfere with proper prosecutions at the appropriate time. We have not held out the slightest hope that parties guilty of criminal violations of the law would escape.

In April and May last there being indication that the Interstate Commerce Commission, by examining them, might immunize certain central figures in the unlawful arrangement, it was asked carefully to consider the effect of such action. Nevertheless, Mellen and perhaps others flagrantly culpable were put upon the stand, and any criminal prosecution hereafter instituted probably will be embarrassed by a claim of immunity interposed in their behalf.

With the utmost patience and an intense desire to enforce the law in such way as to bring no unnecessary hardship upon New England or the unfortunate holders of the railroad securities, we have sought to compel a restoration of lawful conditions; but, as I believe, without proper justification the board of directors resolutely decline to proceed under an approved arrangement adequate to that end and altogether fair.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the time is at hand when we should file a proceeding in equity, seeking the dissolution of the unlawful monopoly of transportation facilities in New England, and that the criminal aspects of the case should be laid before a grand jury.

If these suggestions meet with your approval, I will immediately give the necessary directions.

Faithfully, yours,

(Signed) J. C. MCREYNOLDS,
Attorney General.

Inclosure.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 9, 1914.

Mr. J. H. HUSTIS,
President the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., New Haven, Conn.

MY DEAR SIR: Permit me to reply to your letter of July 8, inclosing copies of resolutions adopted by the directors of the New Haven Railroad Co. on June 25 and July 8, respectively. I also have a letter of July 6 from your counsel, Mr. Moorefield Storey, of Boston.

In effect these communications announce that because the statute, recently passed by the Massachusetts Legislature, granting power to the New Haven Railroad Co. to dispose of its interest in the majority stock of the Boston & Maine Railroad reserves to that Commonwealth the right at any time hereafter to purchase such stock at a fair valuation, to be ascertained by legal processes, your directors feel at liberty to abandon any further effort to comply with the solemn proposals which they heretofore made to me, and which were approved as adequate to bring the affairs of that company into compliance with the law.

I emphatically object to the course proposed, and submit that it is without justification.

Their action raises a question of very large public importance, demanding serious consideration, and if persisted in your company, its officers and directors, must accept the sole responsibility for the inevitable consequences.

Shortly after the present administration entered upon its duties I employed special counsel and set on foot an investigation of the affairs of the New Haven Railroad for the purpose of ascertaining the exact conditions. In due time, it developed that the antitrust laws were being violated, and I accordingly directed the preparation of a bill to restrain and prevent further infractions. Before this could be written and filed, and about the 1st of September last, there was a change in the management of your road. Shortly thereafter its accredited representatives came here, sought an interview with me, expressed a sincere desire to comply with the law, and pointed out the evil consequences which they thought would fall upon all New England if suit were instituted. They were especially anxious to obtain time, and led me to believe that they were acting in the utmost good faith. I withheld the suit, and much time and labor were expended in negotiating the details of an adjustment. In working these out, information and suggestions were received from many sources, and the utmost liberality was exercised in a sincere effort to solve a great problem, so that the law might be fairly complied with and substantial competition in transportation in New England be reestablished—all with the smallest possible immediate damage to the industrial and financial situation.

The plan finally evolved was accepted with practical unanimity both by the directors and stockholders of your road. The disposition by the New Haven road of its interest in the stock of the Boston & Maine was an essential.

In the year 1909, in order to enable the New Haven Railroad to control the Boston & Maine, the Massachusetts Legislature created the Boston Railroad Holding Co., giving it authority to hold stock in the latter road and at the same time authorized the former road to own the stock of the holding company. The act expressly provided that the holding company should not sell its Boston & Maine stock, nor should the New Haven road sell the stock of the holding company without the consent of the legislature; and, further, that the State should have the right to purchase the stock of the holding company at a price to be fixed in a prescribed way.

The agreement which your company has with me provides that it will ask the governor of Massachusetts to propose to the legislature "to amend the charter of the Boston Railroad Holding Co., removing the prohibition against the sale of the Boston & Maine stock now owned by the holding company."

In due time the governor did make this request, and, responding thereto, the legislature passed an act removing the prohibition and authorizing the disposition of the stock.

A further provision declares "this stock may at any time be taken or purchased by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts at the fair value thereof in accordance with law," and requires this to be stamped upon the certificates themselves."

It must be remembered that ever since 1909 the Commonwealth has had the right to purchase the New Haven Holding Co. stock at a valuation to be determined in substantially the same way as is now provided in respect of the Boston & Maine stock; and therefore the New Haven's interest in the Boston & Maine Railroad is not subjected by the recent statute to any restrictions more burdensome than those imposed upon it when the New Haven was authorized to acquire it.

Obviously, it is now within the power of the New Haven Railroad to carry out the agreement and understanding which its representatives made with me, and thereby to remove all question of good faith and prevent all of the calamitous results to the public interest which they so earnestly represented would follow the institution of a suit by the Government.

Your counsel, referring to the Boston & Maine stock, now in effect owned by the New Haven, says that the recent enactment "retains the control by Massachusetts over the stock to such an extent as to make it unmarketable," and upon this ground it is sought to justify the action which your directors propose to take.

Manifestly the only possible deleterious effect of the control retained by the Commonwealth over the Boston & Maine stock would be upon its selling price. The New Haven, in effect, now owns $22,000,000 of this stock, worth in the market about 35 cents on the dollar, a total value of less than $8,000,000.

How seriously the retained control would affect the fair value can only be a matter of speculation; it certainly would not destroy it, if, indeed, the result would be deleterious at all. All the real property, for example, within the State of Massachusetts is subject to be taken by the Commonwealth, and yet its value is not impaired.

If your directors adhere to the position which they have taken, the plain result will be that, because they think it may be impossible to procure for the $22,000,000 of Boston & Maine stock as much as might be obtained under different circumstances, they are willing to throw aside the agreement solemnly made with me and to subject the whole of New England to the consequences of the litigation which must necessarily follow. If they bring this result about, then the public must know where the responsibility lies and draw its own conclusions concerning the motives which have impelled.

The President directs me to say that he is not yet ready to believe that those who control the New Haven Railroad, in order to secure some possible increase in the selling price of $22,000,000 of stock, now offered at about one-third of its face value, are willing to turn away from a solemn agreement with the Government, made after long and careful consideration, and thereby subject the interests of both New England and the Nation at large to the consequences of prolonged and unnecessary litigation. And he thinks, accordingly, that your board of directors should give this matter serious reconsideration.

Faithfully, yours,

(Signed) J. C. MCREYNOLDS,
Attorney General.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR CALIFORNIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 485) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which were, on page 2, line 1, to strike out "the district of Maryland," and, on page 2, line 8, after "Provided," to strike out all down to "That," in line 12.

Mr. WORKS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to ask the Senator from California what is the object of the bill?

Mr. WORKS. It provides for an additional district judge in California.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the effect of the House amendments?

Mr. WORKS. The effect of the House amendments is to strike out the provision respecting the district of Maryland and simply provide for one district judge in California.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the bill be read, so that we may know what we are doing.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. WORKS. I think I can state to the Senator from Colorado what the effect of the House amendments will be.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not understand what the bill is to which amendments have been made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. WORKS. It is simply a bill providing for an additional district judge in California.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to concur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to give expression to a few thoughts. The events of the past few days as occurring in Mexico are of momentous consequence not only to Mexico, but to the people of America and the civilized world.

On the 27th of August last the President, while addressing the Congress on the Mexican situation, said:

> The steady pressure of a moral force will before many days break the barriers of pride and prejudice down, and we shall triumph as Mexico's friends sooner than we could triumph as her enemies—and how much more handsomely and with how much higher and finer satisfaction of conscience and honor.

A very strong sentiment in this body and in the country endeavored to hold up to ridicule this policy of the President. Had the policy of the President's critics prevailed, bloody battles would have been fought; an army of 250,000 or 300,000 would this day be camping on Mexican soil; thousands of America's brave sons would this moment be sleeping in Mexican graves; thousands of widows and thousands of heartbroken mothers and fathers would be mourning their depleted hearthstones through the death of their loved ones; millions of debt would have been added to our already heavy burden. Surely, Mr. President, this much-ridiculed policy of "watchful waiting" has brought to Mexico and to America manifold and untold blessings. The words "watchful waiting" have passed into a proverb. In after years, when hate and prejudice shall have been allayed and the green sward shall have covered the graves of both brave American and Mexican men, then will the names of Wilson and Bryan be acclaimed, as will be the policy of "watchful waiting," as marking a glorious epoch in the history of this great Nation.

RESURVEY OF ALASKAN COAST.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the other day when the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration I urged some reasons why the amendment covering an increase in the appropriation for dragging operations in Alaska should be adopted. That matter, of course, has been finally disposed of so far as the sundry civil bill is concerned; but I have here a telegram from one of the leading shipping interests on the Pacific coast, setting out the importance of this matter, and I hope we shall be able to get some consideration of this matter in a subsequent bill. The telegram is from Mr. H. F. Alexander, president of the Pacific Alaska Navigation Co., and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

TACOMA, WASH., July 21.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Note by press dispatches this morning conferees on sundry civil bill have assented to striking out appropriation for wire-drag apparatus, urgently required for Alaskan waters. In the name of humanity urgently request you use your influence restore item reading for surveys and resurveys of coast of Pacific Ocean under jurisdiction of United States, page 144, lines 4 to 6, inclusive, to the sum of $225,000, as Senate passed it, in order that this wire-drag apparatus may be supplied. If Congress could but realize the safeguard this means to human lives and with increasing travel to Alaska the absolute necessity of it, there would be no question of unanimous favorable action.

H. F. ALEXANDER,
President Pacific Alaska Navigation Co.

Mr. JONES. I also ask that similar telegrams which have been received from the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle and from Hon. J. C. Ford, head of the great shipping interests there, may be noted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We have requested Portland and San Francisco Chambers to appeal to Oregon and California Senators and Congressmen for restoration coast-survey item in sundry civil bill providing for wire-drag apparatus; we have also wired every Member of Washington delegation. Elimination of item places Government in position continuous gross criminal negligence in such instances as steamer State of California disaster.

SEATTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge in the name of humanity that you use every possible influence you can bring to bear to secure approval Secretary of Commerce estimate of resurveys of Alaskan coast, particularly wire drag. If this necessary precaution is longer neglected additional loss of life sure to ensue.

J. C. FORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to state, in connection with the telegrams just presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], that I have received a great many communications of a like tenor. I will not ask to have them inserted in the RECORD, for I think some of them are from the same parties as those received by the Senator from Washington. The commercial bodies of Portland, Oreg., and others who are interested in the shipping interests on the Pacific coast have wired me stating the necessity for this appropriation for the preservation of human life in Alaskan waters.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to state, for the information of the Senate, that there is a peculiar condition which exists in connection with this matter, which, if it were understood by Congress, I think there would be no difficulty in securing the appropriation desired.

Some of the mountains in Alaska run up to sharp points, different from any other mountains which I have ever seen. They run up to a point as fine as is possible, apparently; indeed, they are called "saw-tooth" mountains. The inland passage to Alaska is a tortuous channel, and when steamers loaded with freight and passengers have to work their way through it in the fog they do so by sounding the whistle, and judge of their location by the echo from the rocks which surround them. The fog comes down impenetrably, and as I have said vessels have to work their way through a tortuous channel, such as that shown by the map which hangs here on the wall of the Chamber showing the channel of the Mississippi River. They have no bearings whatever; there are but few lighthouses. By reading the log and sounding the whistle the pilot, if he is accustomed to the channel, can tell by the echo about where he is. Sticking up in those channels in places are pinnacle-pointed rocks. You can not discover them with a sounding lead; there would not be one chance in a thousand that you would ever drop the sounding lead down on top of one of them, for they come to a point, but by placing a drag under the water they could be located and buoys placed over them.

Owing to the fact that the Government has never charted that channel and marked these rocks properly, many accidents have occurred in those waters and a number of steamers have gone down. When they do go down they sink in water that is from 200 to 300 feet deep and icy cold, for the glaciers keep dropping loose chunks of ice and icebergs into the water and keep it so cold that a human being can exist in it only for a short time, and one can not swim ashore as he might be able to do in warmer water. Even with a life preserver one would soon lose his life in that cold water.

The only proper method of picking up these rocks and marking them is that which the fishermen use, of hauling a drag along behind a steamer at a certain depth and locating them and placing a buoy over them. This is a vastly important matter. A number of vessels—I do not know how many, but quite a number—have been wrecked there and some are being wrecked every year, and many people lose their lives. It will not cost much to perform this work, and it would be a proper expenditure; it is one of the best items in that bill.

Mr. STONE. How much is appropriated?

Mr. LANE. I do not remember the exact amount, but it is not much.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. LANE. The Senator from Virginia can probably tell.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this matter has been before both Houses of Congress and has been finally disposed of by both of them. I agree with all the Senator says, but we were unable to accomplish what we wanted, and, as I have said, the matter has been settled, both branches having acted upon it.

Mr. LANE. And refused to grant the appropriation?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They have refused to give the amount requested for this purpose.

Mr. LANE. How much was it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. About $150,000, as I recall.

Mr. LANE. It was something like that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It ought to have been appropriated, I think, but the matter has been settled.

Mr. LANE. It is very unfortunate that both Houses of Congress should have refused to grant an appropriation for so good a purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I agree with the Senator, but they did do it.

Mr. STONE. Well, there is this consolation about it, I will say to the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri asked how much it cost to make this survey, I believe.

Mr. STONE. I asked how much the appropriation was.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was no appropriation at all. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the lowest amount estimated by the department for this purpose was $18,000. I will ask that the Secretary read the bill which I have introduced here pertaining to this subject.

Mr. STONE. I understand, according to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the matter has been disposed of. I was going to say to the Senator from Oregon that there would be this consolation following the failure of this appropriation, that, if the spirit of liberality in erecting monuments and memorial tablets which has prevailed here of late continues, after a disaster in these waters and a large number of men, women, and children have been drowned, he might probably get $200,000 appropriated for a monument.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to state to the Senator that thirty-odd lives were lost in these waters about a year ago.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order has been called for. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have a statement in connection with the same subject which has just been discussed which might properly be introduced under the head of petitions and memorials, but as it has in substance already been introduced by my colleague, I will not do so. I should like, however, in that connection, to say a word in answer to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I have not said anything to answer.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is not by any means a matter that is disposed of. It is true that a similar matter was disposed of in the sundry civil appropriation bill, but consideration will be asked for other bills dealing with this question. I desire to emphasize for the benefit of the members of the Appropriations Committee the facts which have been stated this morning in order that they may consider them in connection with another bill which I hope will be acted on as early as possible.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THORNTON. I present petitions signed by a large number of citizens of Louisiana, and forwarded to me by R. W. Parmele, president of the Louisiana Conference of the Seventh-day Adventists, held at New Orleans, La., praying for national prohibition. I ask that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURTON. I have a brief telegram, relating to the granting of exclusive agencies by manufacturers and jobbers, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 21, 1914.

Hon. T. E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We understand that the Clayton antitrust bill includes clauses relating to trade contracts in regard to granting exclusive agencies by manufacturers and jobbers to retail dealers. Also provisions restricting trade discounts and special arrangements to secure cooperation on sale of manufactured articles by the dealer. Such arrangements have been proved by long experience advantageous and necessary, and any changes such as this bill provides would be radical and disturbing to every business community. We earnestly solicit your aid in opposition to such clauses in the bill as affect present conditions, which are satisfactory to manufacturers, dealers, and consumers.

THE HALE & HOLMES CO.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Provo, Utah, praying that in the event of war the Second United States Volunteer Cavalry be reenlisted, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NELSON presented memorials of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for the enactment of the so-called antitrust legislation, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide a literacy test for immigrants to this country, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Manchester, Lebanon, and Penacook, in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of H. W. Sullivan, of Berlin, N. H., and a petition of Milford Branch, Granite Cutters' International Association of America, of New Hampshire, praying for the enactment of the so-called antitrust legislation, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Berwick, Me., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a petition of the Indiana Christian Endeavor Union and a petition of the congregation of the Fort Wayne Baptist Association, of Kendallville, Ind., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorials of Edward H. Meyer, Sanford Reed, Joseph V. Ford, and 47 other citizens of Allen, Hancock, and Vanderburg Counties; of Fritz Meinberg, T. R. Hunt, and 5 other citizens of Marion and Allen Counties; and of George Baker and 2 other citizens of Lawrenceburg, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Kokomo, Ind., praying for the adoption of a 1-cent letter postage, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Presbyterian Church, of Michigan City, Ind., and a petition of the city council of Hammond, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WORKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5990) to authorize the sale and issuance of patent for certain land to William G. Kerckhoff (Rept. No. 701); and

A bill (H. R. 16476) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the city of Susanville, in Lassen County, Cal., for certain lands, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 700).

VOTES OF TARIFF LAW OF 1913 (S. DOC. NO. 556).

Mr. CHILTON. On July 15 the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] presented and had referred to the Committee on Printing for action a statement of the yea-and-nay votes taken in the Senate on all amendments to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, approved October 3, 1913. I am directed by the committee to report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 429) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the statement prepared in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, entitled "Yea-and-nay votes in the Senate on the Underwood-Simmons Tariff Act," approved October 3, 1913, and submitted by Mr. Simmons on July 15, 1914, be printed as a Senate document, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate folding room.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, the document referred to will go to the folding room, and will then be apportioned among Senators?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LOCATION OF DEPOSITS OF PHOSPHATE ROCK.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 6106) validating locations of deposits of phosphate rock heretofore made in good faith under the placer-mining laws of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 699) thereon. This is a department bill, and it is desired to get it to the House and have it acted upon at the earliest possible date. It proposes to validate certain locations on the public lands, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on line 3, after the word "lands," to strike out the words "supposed to contain" and insert "containing," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That where public lands containing deposits of phosphate rock have heretofore been located in good faith under the placer-mining laws of the United States, such locations shall be valid and may be perfected under the provisions of said placer-mining laws, and such locations shall give title and possession to such deposits. This act shall apply to such locations heretofore patented: Provided, That this act shall not apply to any locations made subsequent to the withdrawal of such lands from location, nor shall it apply to lands included in an adverse or conflicting lode location unless such adverse or conflicting location is abandoned.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask why the words "supposed to contain" are stricken out and the word "containing" substituted? Does it mean that there must be an actual investigation and discovery?

Mr. SMOOT. There must be before a patent can be issued; and the department called attention to the matter this morning in a letter recommending that the word "containing" be used, in conformity with all the other requirements of the mining laws.

Mr. BURTON. That is in accordance with the general mining laws, is it?

Mr. SMOOT. It is in accordance with the general mining laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, an editorial from the Omaha World-Herald bearing on the Federal trade commission bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What was the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That an editorial from the Omaha World-Herald on the trade commission bill be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, an editorial from the New York Evening Post of July 21, entitled "Snap judgment on the tariff."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

SNAP JUDGMENT ON THE TARIFF.

"The foregoing figures," says the Sun, "indicate that the period has probably been entered upon in which it can no longer be said by administration apologists that the workings of the revised tariff have yet to be determined." The figures referred to are those of the total exports and imports for "the last quarter of the fiscal year ended June 30 last, compared with the corresponding quarter in the preceding year." These show that the imports for the three months in 1914 were $83,000,000 greater than in 1913, while the exports were $77,000,000 less than in 1913. Why the lowering of the tariff should have caused this decline in exports is a mystery we shall not attempt to enter into; but it is a quite legitimate hypothesis that it may have caused the increase of imports, since that is the natural working of a reduction of import duties. But it is not our purpose to go into the question of causation; what we wish to examine is the value of the comparison itself, even as making a prima facie case.

When we speak of a prima facie case, we mean the case presented by a bare citation of gross figures, without analysis of component items, and without even the most rudimentary consideration of the facts behind the figures. Even from this standpoint it ought to be evident to anybody that has handled statistics at all that the comparison of two successive years is quite worthless in the absence of reference to preceding years. Now, in this matter of exports, it is true that the figures for the April-June quarter of 1914 fall $76,000,000 below those for 1913; but the figures for the quarter in 1913 were not only exceptional, but broke all previous records by $65,000,000 and all records except one by the enormous amount of $105,000,000. Up to 1913, when the figure for the quarter was $558,000,000, the record had been $493,000,000, in 1912; the next highest figure was $453,000,000, in 1911. Now, the exports for the quarter in 1914 were $482,000,000, which is $29,000,000 higher than the 1911 figure, and only $11,000,000—or 2¼ per cent—lower than the high mark made in 1912. Is this a showing which—even on the face of the figures, not to speak of a real investigation of the question—is so fatally damaging that it can "no longer be said" that the "workings of the revised tariff have yet to be determined"?

Not only for a month, and not only for a quarter, but for whole years, the fluctuations of imports and exports are so great that any attempt to jump at broad conclusions from a single instance of the kind is utterly wild. "There is certainly a singular coincidence," says the Sun, "between the effectiveness of tariff revision and the phenomena of the country's foreign and domestic trade unless there is a connection between them." Our nimble-witted contemporary can hardly have been serious in saying this. Figures quite as striking as this coincidence which it affects to regard as so "singular" are dotted all over the figures of trade. In 1901 exports for the April-June quarter were $348,000,000; in 1902 they fell to $301,000,000; and they remained more than $40,000,000 below the 1901 figures in 1903 and 1904. Our "favorable" balance of trade, after having stood near the half-billion mark every fiscal year from 1898 to 1908, inclusive, and having been $666,000,000 in the last-named year, suddenly dropped to $351,000,000 in 1909 and fell to $188,000,000 in 1910. As for the most recent figures, those which the Sun regards as so significant, nothing would be easier than to give them the opposite twist. We might regard the figures for June, taken by itself, as showing that the new tariff is just beginning to get its hand in. We might say that we have had to take time to reap the fruits of cheap imports in the shape of the ability to compete in exports, and that the June figures show it. For, while April exports fell $17,000,000 below 1912, and May exports likewise were $14,000,000 short of 1912, in June they have been $20,000,000 ahead of 1902, and have made a high record for the month of June, with the single exception of 1913, which was only $6,000,000 ahead of 1914. Does not this show that precisely that thing is happening which President Wilson so absolutely foretold a few weeks ago—that we are on the eve of the biggest boom the country has ever known? No; it does not; but it shows it quite as well as some other figures show some other things.

So much for the face value of the figures; it happens, fortunately, that a comparison going just a little further back reduces that face value to just about zero. But if it had not so happened, there would still be no conclusiveness in them—no; not even a reasonable amount of probable significance. For even if the figures really showed an unusual state of facts, it would still be idle to draw any important inference from them. Even if the statistics did show—as they do not—how the new tariff has been working in the past three months, it would still be the height of rashness to judge of its lasting results from so brief an experience. Certainly it is not the direct effect of lowered duties to check exports; and if it were granted that this result had indirectly followed, a natural presumption would be that this is a mere phenomenon of the transition period—that it is due not to the tariff being low, but to disturbances produced by the change. This presumption might, indeed, be false; but surely it would require more than the trifling period of time under consideration to establish the contrary. Joseph Chamberlain, it will be remembered, fell into a deep pit, out of which his party was never able to extricate itself, through being too quick on the trigger with statistics; and likewise in a year or two the figures of American foreign trade may make conclusions drawn from those of the last three months look particularly foolish.

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES RICHARDSON.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in connection with matters which are going into the RECORD, I have here an address by Hon. Charles Richardson, of Tacoma, Wash., entitled "Some New Problems in Law and Finance," delivered before the State Bankers' Association at Walla Walla, Wash., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not been much of an objector, but in looking over the RECORD, at a meeting of the Appropriations Committee, and estimating the salary that a certain gentleman will receive who indexes the RECORD, we were rather startled. We have never had so many pages of the RECORD before at any session of Congress, and Heaven only knows how many we will have if we continue to publish everything that is written and said all over the country.

I will ask the Senator from Washington if it would not suit his purpose if he had the address which he desires printed in the RECORD referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it printed as a Senate document?

Mr. JONES. No, Mr. President; it would not, because, so far as I am concerned, I would much prefer to have these matters printed in the RECORD, where I can get them when I want them, than to have them printed as documents, where I can not find them when I want them. Such matters as I ask to have printed in the RECORD are matters which I think really ought to be printed there, and I want them to be printed there, so that I can get them when I want to refer to them. That is my only reason for asking that this address be printed in the RECORD. I myself would much rather have anything I want printed put into the RECORD than to have it printed as a document, in which form I never can find it when I want it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had supposed—of course I am old fashioned—that the RECORD had some significance, and that it was a record of the proceedings of this body and of the other House. I have my desk full of material on various topics that I should like to put into the RECORD, some of it most illuminating, but I do not feel like asking to have it printed in the RECORD, because, as I have suggested, the RECORD has now reached enormous proportions. I will ask the Senator from Virginia if he remembers how many pages we have up to date of what we call the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? The question was raised at a meeting of the committee of conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Thirteen thousand six hundred and ten pages up to date.

Mr. GALLINGER. Thirteen thousand six hundred and ten pages to date. It can readily be seen where we are drifting if we encumber the RECORD with everything that we individually should like to see printed in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not object.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the request of the Senator from Washington, but I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to one matter. As has been stated, for this session we have now in the RECORD 13,610 printed pages. I wish to say that some little while ago I made a computation, so far as the Senate proceedings are concerned, and about 40 per cent of all that is printed in the RECORD as the proceedings of the Senate is made up of outside matter, and I think it ought to be stopped; but I felt that I did not want to object here every morning to newspaper articles and editorials and clippings from every magazine in the country going into the RECORD. It certainly ought to cease, however. We pay $1.20 a page to the indexer of the RECORD, and, as I say, we now have 13,610 pages of the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will object. I will say to the Senator from Washington that I shall not object to having the matter printed as a public document, but I do object to printing an address of somebody else in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if the Senator has objected, I do not care to have this matter printed as a public document. When the subject comes up for discussion on the trust bills I shall read this address into the RECORD, because it is an address that is much more entertaining and much more interesting and much more instructive than some addresses that get into the RECORD otherwise.

I do not ask very often to have matters put in the RECORD. I do not believe in cumbering the RECORD with everything that comes along; but once in a while, when I find a matter that I think is very interesting and rather instructive, I sometimes want to put it in the RECORD, so as to have it preserved where it can be gotten at.

I do not, of course, object to the Senator's objecting, but I will get the address in the RECORD in time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not conclude what I started to say just a moment ago. If Senators have noticed, there are very few public documents authorized printed by the House of Representatives. I believe the Senate authorizes 25 to 1 of the House; and it has now become the general practice if a Member of the House wants anything printed as a public document he comes to the Senate and asks some Senator to request that it be printed as a public document.

When the statement is made up at the close of the year I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the House will be able to point to this session of the Senate as being the most extravagant one in the history of the Senate in printing public documents and outside matter in the RECORD; and it will show that the amount of public documents ordered printed by the Senate will be, I think, twenty-five times as many as the documents ordered printed by the House.

I think we ought to take notice of this and be a little careful as to what we order printed from now on.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 554).

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the general deficiency bill and move its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. Amendment numbered 46: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the amendment strike out the word "continuation" and insert the word "commencement"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 118: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 118, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$4,393.51"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 136: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 136, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 29 of the bill, after line 7, insert the word "Senate," and in lieu of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"For employees of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor from July 1, 1914, to June 30, 1915, both dates inclusive, as follows: Clerk, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,200; in all, $4,860."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 137: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 137, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

Porter, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, from March 26 to April 6, 1913, and Nettie K. De Freitas, at the rate of $1,200 per annum, from March 26 to April 14, 1913, as clerk and stenographer, respectively, to Senator Sherman."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 149: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 149, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "To reimburse the official reporters of debates for moneys actually and necessarily expended by them to June 30, 1914, $3,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 158: The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendment of the Senate numbered 158.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
N. P. BRYAN,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
T. U. SISSON,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the amendment appropriating $20,000 for the construction of an elevator and for the improvement of the public building at Martinsburg, W. Va., was stricken out by the conference committee, or whether it is retained in the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senate receded from that amendment. It was not estimated for, and the department stated if they had the money they could not expend it. They did not desire it and could not expend it in the next year if they had it.

Although the Senate had put in the appropriation, and we insisted upon retaining it in the bill, it can be readily understood by the Senate and by the Senator from West Virginia that it was impossible for the Senate conferees to maintain an item in the bill when the department stated that they did not need it, had not estimated for it, and could not expend it if we appropriated it. Under those circumstances the Senate receded.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia is mistaken as to the facts, and the department is mistaken in its statement.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—well, the Senator can go ahead and get through, but he is absolutely mistaken in his statement.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, two years ago the Congress of the United States authorized this public work at Martinsburg, and the department was authorized and instructed to contract for it under, an authorization that the expenditure should be $20,000. Not only that, but there was an estimate for it at the time, and the specific authority of the Congress of the United States to do the work. All of that was laid before the Appropriations Committee, and upon the strength of that the point of order against the item was not made when I presented the amendment in the Senate.

I do not like the excuse that a department of the Government is not ready to carry out the will of Congress. Congress has a right, if it thinks that the public business requires it, and the situation is such regarding this public building as to require it, to say that this public work shall be done; and it does not sound well to me, standing in my place here, to have a department of the Government say that it can not use or will not use an appropriation made by the Congress of the United States.

I do not want to criticize the Senator from Virginia nor the other conferees upon the part of the Senate. They are friends of mine, and they are certainly conscientious, good public servants. I am sure they did what they thought was best; but I am just tired of being bulldozed about these little matters.

I ask that this matter go over, Mr. President. We might just as well fight it out here and now as anywhere. I ask that the matter go over, in order that I may investigate the facts; and if we have to make a fight now with one of these departments as to whether Congress shall say or it shall say whether or not this shall be done, I am prepared to make the fight.

The Congress of the United States two years ago said that this work should be done. It is much more needed than a great deal of other work appropriated for by this bill. It is about the only thing I have in the bill, and it is for a work that is needed. This public building in my State needs an elevator. I have convinced the Congress of this fact. I do not propose to have a head of a department here say that it shall not be done when the Congress of the United States says it wants it done.

I am going to ask that the matter go over, so that I can make an investigation; and, if necessary, I propose to fight this conference report until the rights of West Virginia shall be respected.

I ask that the conference report go over and be printed. Meanwhile I can ascertain why it is that a work estimated for nearly two years ago and authorized by act of Congress in March, 1913, can not be done now, if Congress shall order it done and appropriate the money.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My motion is before the Senate, and of course it can not go over unless the Senate so decide. The Senate will have to vote on the proposition. If they desire to reject the conference report, of course they can do so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is an astonishing statement that we can not dispose of a conference report except by voting upon it here and now. It was my purpose to ask that the conference report be printed for the information of the Senate. We have no information whatever from the reading of the report as to what there is in it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator wants any information on any item in the bill, I shall be very glad to give it to him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But we can not tell anything about the items in the bill. The amendments are simply numbered, and there are a hundred of them.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If there is any item in which the Senator is interested——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that the report may be printed for the information of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Chair can rule on the matter. I move the adoption of the report. It is in order, and it is a privileged motion, and there is no way to carry it over except the will of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I for one can not understand the state of mind by which the chairman of the Appropriations Committee refuses general information upon a bill of this character. Here are a hundred or more amendments, and they are precipitated into the Senate without a moment's notice. We do not know what they are. We have not had time to examine them. I do not know of a single thing in the bill in which I am personally interested, but I do object to this method of procedure, which rams it down the throat of the Senate without investigation and without an opportunity to see and know what we are doing here. We have time for other things, and we certainly have time for this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the rule of the Senate, beyond any question of doubt:

RULE XXVII.

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending or while the Senate is dividing; and when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

The Chair believes both the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Wyoming are raising the question whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the report; and the Chair accordingly rules that the question to be put now, and to be determined without debate, is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The ruling is absolutely satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report? [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but under the terms of it I have a right to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

So the motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report is before the Senate. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate concur in the report.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, in view of the large number of votes that have been cast against the consideration of the report to-day, I am willing that it shall go over. I will say that I pursued the usual course. I have never had before the Senate since I have been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations an appropriation bill which has as little of controversy in it, and it never entered my mind that there was any occasion for delay or that anyone would think there was any occasion for delay in this matter. We all know that these bills have been delayed here, through legislation pending, until it is far past the time when they are usually passed. I pursued the course that has been adopted on every other appropriation bill that I have handled before the Senate at this session.

I had not the slightest idea that there was any occasion for delay or for printing the report. The only objection was made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], and I could not conceive that it was possible that the Senate wanted a delay in order to investigate a little item for a public building in West Virginia, where, the department states, they did not desire it and had not estimated for it, and that if the money was given them they could not expend it in the current year. It was left out on that statement of fact from the department. But in view of the large vote in favor of postponing the report I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed and go over. It is of course a matter of no interest to me personally. The only interest I had was to facilitate the business of the Senate, and it is entirely immaterial to me whether the report is considered to-morrow, or next week, or at any other time. The Senator from Wyoming talked as though I were trying to ram it down the throats of people. I thought it was a thing that the Senate wanted. I had no idea of forcing anything on anybody, and I do not desire to do it now.

I ask unanimous consent that the report may go over and be printed, and I will call it up when I think the Senate is ready for it. I have no desire to hurry it at all. I am perfectly willing that it shall go over and be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, of course I withdraw the statement that the Senator attributes to me. I have no idea that the Senator had any such intention whatever as to use undue haste or to muzzle in any way the deliberations of this body. But it occurred to me, Mr. President, that when a request is made for the printing of a conference report in order that each Senator for himself and at his leisure may look over and see what consideration has been given to the various amendments it has been universally conceded that that should be done and that the report should lie over one day for that purpose.

The Senator says that all he is interested in is the dispatch of the public business. I wish to say to the Senator that I have no disposition to delay the public business, and I will call his attention to the fact that there has been no undue delay in regard to this bill. The bill was passed by the House of Representatives July 15, less than one week ago. It was passed with amendments by the Senate July 18, and it was not delayed more than two hours in its passage by the Senate, and we now have the conference report dealing with 150 or 160 amendments.

It was with no desire to delay but with a desire that every Member of the Senate who is interested in particular amendments or who is interested in the general bill might have an opportunity to discover what has become of the 150 amendments of the Senate that I asked to have the report printed. I thought then and I think now that it was a reasonable request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will go over and be printed.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 698) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a conference report on the Indian appropriation bill. I will not request that it be read. It is very lengthy. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it ought to be read. It must be read, indeed, at some time.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, and was interrupted by,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. I then ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with. It is quite obvious that no information is given to the Senate by the reading of the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked that the report should be read. I object to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report (S. Doc. No. 553), which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. HILO, HAWAII, STREET RAILWAY.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there is a bill on the calendar which I have reported from the Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with relation merely to the extension of a franchise for a street railway that passes Government land. The present franchise expires on the 1st day of August, and something must be done before that time in order to let them operate. They have expended $15,000 there, and they will forfeit $5,000 if the franchise is not extended for two years. It is a simple bill; it has passed the House; it has been recommended by the department and recommended by the governor of Hawaii; and it seems to me that it ought to pass without any question. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 8660.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill under the statement made by the Senator from Colorado, but I wish to announce that I shall object to any other bills. I am anxious to have the river and harbor bill proceeded with.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator from Louisiana, he is willing to let this bill pass, but he will object to all others.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir. I knew nothing about this bill before the Senator from Colorado rose, but under the statement which he made I think it presents a very strong case. However, I shall be compelled to object to others in order that we may proceed with the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to object to the bill. I merely wish that the Senator would extend his mercy a little.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8660) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii," approved August 1, 1912.

It proposes to amend section 4 of the act so that the first paragraph of subsection (e) thereof shall read as follows:

(e) The construction of the railway shall be commenced, and at least the sum of $20,000 shall have been expended or contracted to be expended within four years after the passage of this act by the Congress of the United States, and at least 2 miles shall be completed, equipped, and ready for the transportation of passengers within two years after such commencement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I will occupy the floor, if no one on the other side among the advocates of the bill desires to proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator I think it is the general desire that he shall occupy the floor until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. BURTON. I wish again, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that the river and harbor bill was temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the pension bills, and it has not been again laid before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be again laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, yesterday at the close of my remarks I was dwelling upon the harbors of the country. I desire, in the first place, to point out the difference in the results achieved by harbor improvements and those gained by river improvements and to make the statement that, in a general way, appropriations for harbors have been profitable, have promoted the commerce of the country, and have not been subject to the criticisms which can be visited upon the improvements of rivers.

At the top of column 2, page 12423, of the RECORD, a list is given of the harbors of the United States on which more than $5,000,000 has been expended, in the relative order of their commerce for the last year for which figures are available. I regret that it is not possible to make this statement more satisfactory. There exists, first, the difficulty of obtaining accurate facts as to traffic, and the question is still further complicated by the existence of subsidiary and subordinate channels in or near to the main body of many harbors. For instance, in the port of New York we have the Hudson River, the East River, and the channels in the east side of the bay; we have also Newtown Creek, in Brooklyn, and a very large number of smaller channels, which are virtually portions of the port of New York.

In Boston, in addition to the main harbor, there is Chelsea Creek, also the Mystic and Malden Rivers, the Fort Point Channel, and the Neponset River, with others, perhaps, near at hand which are essentially a portion of the harbor.

The question is still further complicated when we come to consider the expenditures upon these various improvements. A part of the expense for New York City is the harbor proper, including the approaches to the city; a part is for the Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channels; a part for East River and Hell Gate, between New York City and Brooklyn; a small amount for the improvement of the Hudson River between New York and New Jersey, the city of New York on the one side and the cities of Jersey City and Hoboken on the other.

The difficulty of giving any accurate classification is illustrated by the necessity for using eight footnotes in explaining conditions pertaining to 15 harbors. I can not claim that this table is absolutely accurate, but I think it is as nearly correct as any statistics which have been prepared.

Yesterday I took up the three harbors having the largest tonnage traffic, New York City, Duluth-Superior, and Philadelphia. In this connection it is appropriate to say that there are divers standards to determine the importance of a port. One would be the value of the exports and imports or of the receipts and shipments. Another, particularly pertinent to foreign trade, would be the proportions between foreign and domestic trade. Still another would be the net tonnage of boats entering and clearing. The fourth, and the one which is generally accepted as the most perfect standard of the prominence of a port, is the quantity of freight or tonnage received and shipped.

There are obvious reasons why this fourth standard or rule should be adopted. The test of a port, the necessity for depth and provision for vessels of considerable size, all these are determined by the quantity of freight handled more than by any other consideration, and thus a port which receives great quantities of coarse material of low value we put ahead of one which receives a smaller amount of freight, though of much higher value. I may say that this has been the generally accepted rule, because it determines more nearly than anything else the facilities which should be afforded for the entrance of boats for anchorage space and for wharfage. This is true, though, that a hundred tons of iron ore may be less valuable than a single ton of silk or some expensive fabric.

Passing by these first three harbors, the next two of importance in the United States, judged by their tonnage, are Buffalo and Cleveland. It is a significant fact and a sufficient proof of the supreme importance of the Great Lakes in our inland navigation, and indeed in our commercial life, that out of the five ports in the United States having the greatest amount of traffic three are on the Great Lakes—Duluth-Superior, Buffalo, and Cleveland. They are included in the same list of five with New York City and Philadelphia, and if we select ports having a tonnage of 10,000,000 or more, there are six in number, and three of those are on the Great Lakes, the sixth in rank being the port of Baltimore.

On the Great Lakes, at least in these two ports, there is a somewhat different rule as to the division of improvements. The Government furnishes a channel from deep water of the lake to the mouth of a creek or river which is utilized for an inland harbor. Beginning in deep water, jetties or piers are constructed, extending from the lake usually to a point approximately the same as the original shore line, but in view of the extensions out into the water, which have occurred in the large cities, these piers now extend inland somewhat beyond the original water line.

Inside of that point the cities of Buffalo and Cleveland take care of their own harbors, and in that inside portion of the harbor created by Buffalo Creek in the city of Buffalo and by Cuyahoga River in the city of Cleveland, the major part of the freight traffic is handled.

It should also be said of these two ports that the Federal Government has constructed at both cities elaborate breakwaters outside in Lake Erie within which boats may go for shelter and for anchorage, and incidentally, the construction of the breakwaters makes available very valuable dock lands on the water front inside the area protected by them.

I am not familiar with the amounts expended by the city of Buffalo upon Buffalo Creek. I recall that some years ago the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House discovered that the city was not only paying the full expense of its inner harbor but was paying for the expense of dredging between the piers through which the channel from the lake reaches the interior portion. The injustice was so marked that this was corrected, and the Federal Government has undertaken the cost of this expenditure for dredging between the piers.

In the city of Cleveland approximately $3,500,000 has been expended by the municipality for the improvement of this inner harbor, though it is a kind of work which, in many other cities and many other ports, is paid for by the Federal Government.

The city of Buffalo has a tonnage of 17,923,766 tons; the city of Cleveland a tonnage of 14,296,078 tons. In both cases it must be said that the traffic is made up very largely of iron ore and of coal and other similar coarse material. Nevertheless these two harbors are crowded with boats every day during the navigation season of approximately eight months or somewhat less, and only with the utmost difficulty are facilities afforded for anchorage and for wharf room.

This is in a measure remedied by the most perfect loading and unloading machinery to be found anywhere in the world. The ore boats can discharge their cargoes in four or five hours. They are then able to take on a cargo of coal in even less time and go upon their way. If it were not for this equipment for handling traffic the congestion in these two harbors would be intolerable. But as a result of that the average stay of a boat in port is less in the lake harbors than in any other ports of the world.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator how these harbors and ports compare with those of other countries. Has the Senator discussed that or does he intend to discuss it?

I observe there are only three of the majority party here, but I shall not call for a quorum.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. KENYON. I know the Senator wants to proceed and I will not make the demand.

Mr. BURTON. I could discuss that now, but I should prefer, however, to finish the description of the harbors of the United States, and if I then forget it the Senator will kindly call it to my attention.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to correct my statement. I observe that there is one of the majority on that side in the chair, making four, but I will not call for a quorum.

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer that the Senator would not make that call.

The next harbor in line, the sixth in the United States, is that of Baltimore. The improvement of this harbor has consisted largely in dredging the Patapsco River. The harbor is of three divisions—the main portion, southwest Baltimore or Spring Garden, and Curtis Bay. This is another one of the harbors reached by a river. It is made available by dredging in a bay, and in counting the expense for the harbor it seems fair to include the dredging of bay or river channels leading to the wharves. The main portion of the harbor requires dredging 20 miles to deep water in Chesapeake Bay—11 miles in Patapsco River and 9 miles in the bay—and also dredging for some 4½ miles in Chesapeake Bay near its outlet to the sea, about 150 miles from Baltimore. The depth required here is 35 feet. The tide is slight, only a foot or a foot and a half; but in view of the ease with which boats can pass through the river to the wharves, the draft of boats which can enter Baltimore is very nearly as much as the depth of the river. This is not true in many other harbors and in other streams. The disturbance by waves is such that, in addition to the usual depth, an allowance of some feet is necessary for the element of safety.

As I have already mentioned, as a subsidiary portion of this harbor, there is also southwest Baltimore or Spring Garden, with a draft of 27 feet and a harbor 2 miles long and a half a mile wide. Provision was made for this during the last decade, and one reason was that the available wharf room in Baltimore proper was so largely consumed. There is also Curtis Bay, a tidal estuary of the Patapsco River about 6 miles southeast of Baltimore Harbor, with an ordinary draft of 30 feet, and the length of the improved section is 2½ miles.

I seem to have made one unfortunate omission. I am not sure that the amount expended upon it is $5,000,000, but in the importance of their harbor Norfolk and Newport News assume a very important place. The traffic in these harbors is growing rapidly, and they possess excellent natural facilities for all purposes of traffic. Those harbors are omitted here because the total expenditures for the two have not reached $5,000,000. However, in any enumeration of ports in the United States those two must be prominently mentioned.

The next harbor in the order of traffic on which $5,000,000 or more has been expended is Portland, which is reached by the Columbia and Willamette Rivers. The figures given in this table do not quite correctly describe the total traffic; they include more than the traffic of the harbor of Portland. There is a very considerable amount of logging and of other traffic in the Columbia River below the mouth of the Willamette which does not go down to the mouth of the river. The expense of this channel, however, looms very large. It is perhaps the third in cost in the United States, exceeded only by New York City and Philadelphia. The total amount expended upon it to date is $15,525,789.

The next harbor in order of importance is New Orleans. Until within less than 10 years the port of New Orleans, 114 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi River, was reached by boats passing through the South Pass. This was under a plan devised by Capt. Eads many years ago. There are three exits, if you may call them such, of the Mississippi River, and, correspondingly, three entrances from the Gulf—Southeast Pass or Pass a Loutre, South Pass, and Southwest Pass. An elaborate examination was made a short time prior to the year 1900, and the decision was reached that the best of the three for obtaining access to the deep water of the Mississippi behind the passes, and through it to New Orleans, was by the Southwest Pass; that the disadvantages of the South Pass were so considerable that it was desirable to abandon it and to depend entirely upon the Southwest Pass. In pursuance thereto the improvement was undertaken, and it has been prosecuted at great expense. The total expense of these two passes—and there are other expenses not included here, and which are not given in the statement to which I have referred in the RECORD—has been $10,357,288. The total traffic is 4,279,947 tons, which is, however, of a very valuable character.

The next harbor in the importance of its traffic is Galveston, improved at an expense of $9,932,834, with a traffic of 4,117,524 tons. It should be borne in mind, however, that this traffic is made up very largely of two great staples—corn and wheat; that in the last year the value of the exports from the harbor of Galveston was second only to those from New York City; and that there is also this encouraging feature of the port, that the value of its exports is rapidly increasing.

There are few harbors in the United States which have conferred a greater benefit upon the country than Galveston. There was a great region to the west of New Orleans absolutely without any well-developed port. There were divers harbors, but either channels were insufficient or other handicaps prevented their general use. Beginning in the year 1890 an improvement was made at Galveston, and it has justified every dollar of its expense. It has added to the price of wheat in that region west of the Missouri, extending north as far as to include Nebraska. It has not only afforded competition in routes under which grain can be sent either to the Atlantic seaboard or to the Gulf, but has proven that from localities which found their market in the East grain can be sent to the Gulf and then shipped abroad at less expense than if shipped by way of New York or other Atlantic seaports. Roughly speaking, when you reach the Missouri River you are on the dividing line; it is a question whether it is more profitable to ship from Kansas City or Omaha to the Gulf or to the Atlantic seaboard; but with a grain field located west of the Missouri River the advantage is naturally in shipping to the Gulf. On the other hand, when the grain field is located east of the Missouri River, generally speaking, it is advantageous to ship to the Atlantic seaboard. This generalization is perhaps subject to some limitations, but that remains the general fact, and very largely the reason for this situation is the development of the port of Galveston.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is evident that this bill can not be passed without Democratic votes. There are only two Democrats on the other side of the Chamber, two on this side, and one in the chair. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Burton	Clarke, Ark.	Jones
Bankhead	Camden	Colt	Kern
Borah	Catron	Crawford	Lane
Brady	Chamberlain	Gallinger	Lea, Tenn.
Brandegee	Chilton	Hughes	Lewis
Bryan	Clark, Wyo.	James	Martine, N. J.

Nelson	Saulsbury	Smith, Mich.	Thornton
Norris	Shafroth	Smoot	Tillman
Overman	Sheppard	Stone	Vardaman
Page	Shively	Sutherland	West
Perkins	Simmons	Thomas	White
Ransdell	Smith, Ga.	Thompson

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair). Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. POMERENE responded to his name when called.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the draft of water which can be utilized by boats to Galveston is 30 feet, with an insignificant tide of from 1 to 2 feet; indeed, in the portion some 4½ miles in length leading from the outer bar to the anchorage there is a depth varying from 30 to 33 feet. For a long time traffic in this harbor was carried on a draft of 25 feet and less, but Congress, with the most assiduous care, has provided for a necessary increased depth to take care of the growing commerce of the port.

It must be said that there have been some expenditures on this harbor which can hardly meet with general approval. No one will complain of the construction of the jetties so as to provide a channel from deep water in the Gulf, or of bringing that deep channel to the anchorage grounds; but a considerable sum of money has been expended for dredging a channel, part of the way 1,200 feet wide, up to what is called Fifty-first Street, and then still farther from Fifty-first to Fifty-seventh Streets 1,000 feet in width. This is immediately adjacent to private property, and does not commend itself as a wise rule for the expenditure of public money. There should be a clearly defined distinction between the money spent by municipalities and individuals on the one hand and by the General Government on the other. The dividing line would naturally be placed at a point near the water front of the city. No one would object to bringing deep water from the sea outside through channels to a point near the city, but when it is necessary to excavate so that wharves can be constructed and boats handled adjacent to them the expenditure is less justifiable.

There is, however, one point in connection with this harbor that must be taken into consideration and that is the misfortune of almost unprecedented magnitude which befell that municipality in the year 1900, which exhausted its taxing power, hampered its growth, and justified an exception in this case. So this channel has been extended along the water front near to the wharves, although those wharves are constructed and owned by a private corporation or by railroad companies as a part of their terminals.

In connection with Galveston Harbor there is a channel to what is called Texas City on the mainland, another to Port Bolivar, and another, 58½ miles in length, to the city of Houston, the last mentioned part of the way through open water and part of the way through a narrow stream.

I may say in this connection that in the great State of Texas there is at present a very limited supply of harbors. There is one located on the boundary line between Texas and Louisiana at Sabine Pass, and one at Port Arthur, both of which are located in the State of Texas. Then there is Galveston; there is another at the mouth of the Brazos—Velasco—which, however, is very little developed; and an attempt is being made to develop still another at Aransas Pass. Up to date this has not met with very great success in the handling of traffic, although a very considerable amount of money has been appropriated for it. It is evident that if a harbor can be developed at Aransas Pass, that should be done, as otherwise it is necessary for those in the westerly half of the State of Texas to carry freight across the State of Texas for very long distances in order to reach a suitable port.

The next port on which more than $5,000,000 has been expended, in the order of its commercial importance, is the port of Savannah, having a traffic of 3,120,676 tons. There has been expended upon the harbor and the river leading to it, up to June 30, 1913, the date to which all these figures are given, the sum of $10,456,747. In proportion to its traffic Savannah has been one of the most expensive of our ports. It has been necessary to provide a channel from a point outside the bar, 26 miles from the city of Savannah, to the wharves of the city; that channel has also been extended to the waterworks, 2 miles above the city, and there is a project under way for its partial extension still farther.

I must say, in passing, that the improvement along in front of the wharves of the city would more naturally be undertaken by the city itself. On the other hand, this port in its exports has shown perhaps the greatest percentage of increase in the last three years, an increase amounting to as much as 100 per cent.

It may be interesting to note the increase in the exports of several of our leading ports in order that we may ascertain to what extent these harbors are beneficial to the trade of the country. The value of the exports from the port of New York between the 30th of June, 1909, and the 30th of June, 1912, a period of three years, increased from $607,000,000 to $817,000,000. The exports from the port of Galveston increased from $189,000,000 to $285,000,000, an increase of from 55 to 60 per cent, and in money of nearly a hundred million dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has for a long time been discussing various harbors. He is taking them up one by one in the order of their commercial importance, and he has given the Senate, as he always does, a very interesting history of the different harbors; but I have not up to this time heard the Senator criticize anything in this bill pertaining to the several harbors about which he has been speaking.

The Senator has given us assurances heretofore that he is not filibustering in connection with this legislation. Does the Senator propose, after he has finished this history of the different harbors, to point out to the Senate wherein this bill appropriates money with reference to these harbors improperly or wherein this bill omits to make proper appropriation for these harbors?

Mr. BURTON. I think it will be comparatively easy, Mr. President, to show some defects in our system, and I shall try to do that if I am not interrupted. On the other hand——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator complain of any of the appropriations made in this bill for any of the harbors which he has been discussing?

Mr. BURTON. I have already criticized the appropriations for a portion of the harbor at Galveston, and if the Senator from North Carolina had followed my remarks he would have noticed that I also made a criticism as to the port of Savannah, which was this: I maintain that the proper place for the Government to stop in bringing a channel to a city is at the lower limit of that city, and then let the city dredge in front of its wharves at municipal expense.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a general criticism. Does the Senator complain that this bill carries for those harbors any appropriation that is not a proper provision for the improvement or the maintenance of an improvement in those harbors?

Mr. BURTON. It does, as I recall, both for improvement and maintenance. Not only is provision made for a channel to the waterworks of Savannah, 2 miles above the city, but also to a locality beyond that, as I understand it. This is referred to in the report on page 533.

Mr. SIMMONS. To what harbor is the Senator referring?

Mr. BURTON. The harbor of Savannah. I am quite sure that in about the year 1912 provision was made in the bill for carrying the channel still further up the river. I read from page 535:

> The river and harbor act approved July 25, 1912, extended the existing project in accordance with plan printed in House Document No. 563, Sixty-second Congress, second session, so as to provide for improving the Savannah River from the upper limits of the present project.

Which is 2 miles above the city already—> to the foot of Kings Island by the excavation of a channel 21 feet in depth at mean low water, and 300 feet in width, at an estimated cost of $140,000. * * *

> The expenditures to June 30, 1913, under the 21-foot project of July 25, 1912, amounted to $49,927.82, all of which was for the accomplishment of the project. The outstanding liabilities were $20,136.94.

I am not absolutely certain whether there is a project for part of that expenditure in this bill, but at any rate there must be some provision for its maintenance. Indeed, there is still another provision here which I should like to examine, referred to in another House document, No. 290, Sixty-first Congress, first session.

Mr. President, I speak of that as an objection to the form of river and harbor appropriations which we have been making, but I wish to go further than that in discussing this bill. It is time for us to review this whole subject. I have sought to sever here the best of the bill, that which is least objectionable. I shall make some criticisms upon the way in which this money has been expended, but then I wish to paint the other side of the picture, the appropriations which are being made, in many instances of equal amounts, that are almost thrown away.

I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina or any other advocate of this bill desires that it shall be condemned as altogether bad, and I do not see that I should be criticized or questioned for endeavoring to call attention to the items that are worthy of approval and selecting them from the many errors which abound in this vitiated bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator had referred to quite a number of harbors in his discussion. In response to my inquiry if he had a criticism to make of anything in this bill in reference to those harbors, he specified the harbor of Savannah. I do not find in the bill anything with reference to the harbor of Savannah except the following:

For maintenance, $250,000; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 200, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $154,000.

Does the Senator criticize that particular item in the bill?

Mr. BURTON. It is subject to criticism if part of this amount is expended for improving the portion above the city and above the waterworks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator aware of the fact—I think it is a fact—that this appropriation is not for improvement above the city?

Mr. BURTON. But it is for maintenance of the harbor as adopted by the different projects, first taking the river up to the city 2 miles above the waterworks, and then up to Kings Island. I do not know how far above that is.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator examined that item? I am advised, and I think it is true, that this is for the improvement of the harbor up to the city; and I understood the Senator had approved that character of appropriations, especially with reference to the important harbors of the country.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I think so; to a point near the lower portion of the city. I should say that so far an improvement was justifiable, and the criticism I am making is not of the most serious nature. One of the worst instances in this connection that happened during the last decade was in regard to Richmond and the James River. There was a constant conflict between the general improvement of the river, bringing the channel up to the city, and one for dredging—and it was rock dredging, too—just in front of wharves in the city. A hasty examination of this provision in the act of 1913 does not make clear to me just what the improvement was which we provided for in that year.

Next, I wish to consider the harbor of Boston; and in commenting upon this it is evident that these traffic figures do not do it justice. Some six or eight years ago it was suggested to persons coming here from Boston that it would be well for them to transmit to us more accurate figures of the freight handled in that harbor, and the promise was made that it would be done; but I do not find in the reports any complete statistics on this subject. They seem to have followed, in a measure, the custom in many European cities of giving special prominence to foreign commerce, and neglecting for the most part the domestic commerce. On that harbor the sum of $11,176,774.74 has been expended.

The next is the harbor of Mobile.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he leaves Boston Harbor. Has there not been some plan of cooperation there between the Government and the State and the municipality?

Mr. BURTON. On a small scale only; for instance, in the Neponset River, I believe, which is a part; but in the case of the general channels out through President Roads, and so forth, and even these up the Mystic and Malden Rivers, the Federal Government has paid the expense. There have, however, been an exceptional number of instances of cooperation in Europe. There is a place for criticism, too——

Mr. KENYON. I had understood that either the municipal government or the State had expended a large sum of money there.

Mr. BURTON. The State has expended a very large sum of money in building wharves and terminals—the State or the city, I do not know which it is.

Mr. KENYON. But not in improving the harbor?

Mr. BURTON. But not in dredging the channels, unless it be near or next to the wharves or terminals.

Mr. KENYON. Is a part of the ownership of the shore there in the city?

Mr. BURTON. I think so; though I am not certain about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I just caught an observation by the Senator from Ohio in reference to the fact that most of these improvements were made in the interest of foreign commerce rather than domestic commerce. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. BURTON. I should hardly say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would be true of the harbor of Galveston, would it not?

Mr. BURTON. It is for a very salutary purpose, to provide channels so that our commerce may be carried on with foreign countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I could give the Senator some figures on that subject, showing that there is very little traffic coming into Galveston Harbor. The imports are very small. For instance, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, the imports were $4,309,758. The exports were $218,146,097; so that the exports were 53 times as great as the imports. I think that is probably the largest disproportion of any port in the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have understood that to be so. If I remember correctly, we have spent on Galveston Harbor and waterways in the immediate vicinity something like sixteen or seventeen million dollars.

Mr. BURTON. Including the Houston Channel, the Texas City Channel, Port Bolivar, and all, it would be not far from that amount.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, may I ask the Senator to repeat what the exports are from that port?

Mr. BURTON. Two hundred and eighteen million one hundred and forty-six thousand and ninety-seven dollars in 1912.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, Mr. President, that enormous exportation of American goods was carried from Galveston exclusively in foreign ships, with the exception of one American schooner.

Mr. BURTON. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have an American schooner going out of Galveston carrying the Stars and Stripes at its masthead; and all the rest of that enormous commerce is carried abroad in foreign ships.

Mr. BURTON. Of course this is true, to answer further the question of the Senator from New Hampshire. So far as our domestic shipping is concerned, it would hardly be necessary to provide the same depth and width as for the foreign ships, the great ships that are engaged in the trans-Atlantic trade, but the two are so associated that no one can divide them. In improving a harbor, naturally and necessarily provision would be made both for the domestic commerce and for the foreign commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not a fact that all this extreme depth that we have been compelled to appropriate for in the various harbors of the country has been for the accommodation of foreign ships rather than for American ships?

Mr. BURTON. I should say perhaps that is true; yes. If, however, this traffic were carried in American ships—that is, the traffic to Europe—you would have to have the same sized channels. Presumably we would have just as good ships as they have. We would take advantage of modern economies by building big boats, with ample draft and beam; and I have always regarded the fact that they belonged for the most part to foreigners as incidental rather than otherwise. That, I think, ought not to stand in the way of our improving our harbors, because suppose every foreign flag should be kept out and the freight should be carried by our own ships, we would wish ample depth and ample channels and all proper facilities just as we now provide them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator on that point. What I wanted to emphasize was the fact that we have not any American ships, and we are spending $100,000,000 in this bill, directly and indirectly, to improve our waterways when our ships have been blotted from the oceans of the world. I see no evidence of Congress being willing to make any appropriation to rehabilitate the American merchant marine. That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if I may be permitted just one suggestion, while I should like to see American ships carrying our commerce, I think the Senator from Ohio will agree with me that this wonderful commerce from Galveston Harbor, which he applauds so highly, as I understand, has been very beneficial to Americans. I remember that when they were agitating for the improvement of Galveston Harbor the people of the State of Kansas were among its strongest advocates, saying that a deep harbor at Galveston would enable them to get their grain to Europe very much cheaper than they possibly could in any other way; and I remember a recent statement from one of the owners of the biggest ship line in Boston, saying that the deepening of the channel to 35 feet had reduced the freight charge there on trans-Atlantic commerce fully 50 per cent. So the American people get the benefit of these deeper channels and harbors, even if the goods are not carried in American bottoms.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. The discussion seems to have reached rather an interesting point at this time——

Mr. BURTON. I should like to finish a matter I have in mind before the Senator calls for a quorum.

Mr. KENYON. I observe that there are only seven of the majority party present. It seems to me there should be a larger attendance.

Mr. BURTON. I should like the Senator to postpone that for a little while.

Mr. KENYON. Of course I will defer to the wishes of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I notice, in looking over the figures here, that there is a wide variance between those which I have read in the hearing of the Senate from the report of the Chief of Engineers, volume 1, page 767, and those given in the Statistical Abstract. It shows that if anyone wishes to have his nerves racked there is no more certain or immediate way to accomplish it than by trying to obtain accurate statistics. In the report of the engineers, on page 767, the total value of exports from the port of Galveston, in 1911–12 is given as $285,864,831. In the Statistical Abstract, on page 766, it is given as $218,146,097.

Let me give the amounts again, side by side. In the report of the engineers it is $285,864,831. In the Statistical Abstract it is $218,146,097. There is a difference of $67,000,000 between the two tables. I should presume that the figures as given in the Statistical Abstract were correct; but in any event the figures make Galveston the second exporting harbor of the United States.

I will run briefly through the others, showing the exports from the different harbors.

Mr. BURTON. New Orleans, $144,000,000 in 1908–9; $149,000,000 in 1911–12.

Philadelphia, $84,000,000 in 1908–9; $69,000,000 in 1911–12.

Boston, $76,000,000 in 1908–9; $69,000,000 in 1911–12.

Baltimore, $77,000,000 in 1908–9; $92,000,000 in 1911–12.

Savannah, $50,900,156 in 1908–9; $104,286,925 in 1911–12.

These figures show that the percentage of increase in that port has been greater than in any of the large ports of the country.

The next harbor, to which I have already made brief reference, is Mobile Bay and Harbor, 2,210,486 tons.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, before his attention was diverted, was discussing Boston Harbor.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he leaves Boston Harbor. I shall not disturb the Senator again in this connection, and I would not do so now, but I think the impression of some is that the Senator in discussing these harbors is inferentially criticizing something in the bill with respect to these harbors. That probably grows out of the idea that the Senator would not be discussing these harbors unless he were doing so with some pertinence toward the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Let me correct the Senator from North Carolina in that respect. He, of course, in the utmost good faith, has misapprehended the course of my remarks. I do say that certain appropriations in connection with these harbors do deserve criticism, and before I am through I intend to point out in what regard they are subject to criticism, rather by the expression of general principles which should be observed than by criticism of any specific harbor, but I earnestly desire to go into the whole subject. If the harbors are free from criticism—and I think, for the most part, our policy in that regard has been free from criticism—why, let us know it. This discussion has in view a reform, an improvement in our river and harbor legislation; and if there is something that we had better indorse and leave as it stands, I feel that I ought to state it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he has any objection to the two provisions in the bill with reference to Boston Harbor. I find two, and only two, in the bill. One is:

Improving harbor at Boston, Mass.: For maintenance, $200,000.

The other is:

Improving Boston Harbor, Mass., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 931, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $400,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purchase of a dredge.

I wish to ask the Senator if he disapproves of those items, and whether, as a matter of fact, and as a member of the committee, he has not expressly approved them?

Mr. BURTON. To go into the secrets of the committee room, I expressed the opinion that Boston was a very important harbor, but I thought the appropriation with a view to a depth of 40 and 45 feet even for a portion of the channel would create a precedent that might cause claims from other harbors of similar rank. Part of that appropriation was with a view to obtaining a depth of 45 feet. One of the engineer officers gave as a reason for it that in the outer portion of the channel, next to the ocean, there were sometimes very rough seas, the bottom of the channel was rocky, and a ship coming in from outside in case of storm, if it were a ship of heavy draft, such as 35 feet, or something of that kind, might be pounded against the bottom or side of the channel.

While I feel that Boston is a very important port, it does seem to me that this is a little in advance of what we are doing in other cities. Baltimore has only 35 feet. Philadelphia has only 35 feet in prospective. The tide at Baltimore is perhaps 18 inches. The tide at Philadelphia is 5½ or 6 feet. The tide at Boston is from 9 to 9½ feet. If you give to that port a channel of 40 feet, part of the way 45 feet, what is the precedent you are establishing for these others of equal rank? Indeed, might not New York say, "Our port is altogether the leading one of the country. We have but 40 feet, with about 6 feet of tide; and should Boston have 40 and 45 feet when she has 9 feet of tide?" The reason given for the proposed improvement has a certain amount of validity, namely, the danger arising from heavy seas and the rocky bottom.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want an erroneous impression to exist about this great harbor at Boston. The impression which I got, and which I think anyone will get who reads the report of the engineers, is that they contemplated only a clear depth of 35 feet at Boston. Their reason for advocating this increased depth was that there are very heavy seas in that harbor, and there is a very hard bottom—if I mistake not, a granite bottom—and they said that there must be a very considerable depth under the vessel in order to insure it against danger; whereas, as we all know, the New York channel, while it is 40 feet deep, has a sandy bottom and no big seas. So at Baltimore there is a sandy bottom, if I understand correctly, and there are no big seas.

The situation is different at Boston. The committee did not intend to establish a precedent of a 45-foot channel at Boston. At least, I did not; and I do not think the engineers intended anything of the kind.

Mr. BURTON. Here is the language of the report, Document No. 931, Sixty-third Congress, second session. It clearly recommends 40 and 45 feet, and all that relates to the special reason for it—and it is to an extent a special reason—is this:

Taking into account the low tides at certain times, the effect of the winds upon the water surface, the presence of ledge rock on the bottom, and the necessity for ample clearance for deep-draft vessels, he (the district officer) reaches the conclusion that the inner channel from the navy yard to President Roads should be given a depth of 40 feet at mean low water over a width of 600 feet covering the southerly half of the present 1,200-foot channel. This work is estimated to cost $2,300,000. For the outer or Broad Sound Channel he recommends a depth of 45 feet in the rock section and a nominal depth of 40 feet where the material can be dredged, this channel to be 900 feet wide and to be located along the southeasterly side of the present 35-foot cut, with a slight bend to the eastward at the entrance opposite Finns Ledge. The cost of this channel is estimated at $985,000.

His total recommendation was $3,845,000. Now, next is the report of the board, paragraph 3, on page 3:

These reports have been referred, as required by law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and attention is invited to its report herewith, dated April 22, 1914. * * * For reasons fully explained the board considers it inadvisable to enlarge the present inner channels of Boston Harbor at this time, but it is of opinion that the general project for the harbor should be modified by providing a channel between President Roads and the sea, on the lines recommended by the district officer, 900 feet wide except at the outer end, where it is widened to 1,100 feet, 40 feet deep in general, but 45 feet deep through rock, and the building of a dredging plant, at a total estimated cost of $1,545,000.

No one understands—I certainly did not understand—that it was for the whole distance. That, practically, was the recommendation of the district engineer for half the channel; but this report does recommend 45 feet in the outer section——

Mr. RANSDELL. Where the open sea comes in.

Mr. BURTON. Well there is a chance for quite a sea in the lower portion of the Ambrose Channel, although it is magnificently protected by Long Island and the Jersey coast; but with a southeast wind or a strong south wind high seas would run there.

Mr. RANSDELL. But the Ambrose Channel has a soft bottom, has it not?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; for all the way, I think.

Mr. RANSDELL. They found very little rock there. It is very different from the granite at Boston Harbor.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; it is true that granite or rock is the worst, but an ocean steamer would not find it an agreeable collision if it were thrown against the sand with any considerable force.

Mr. RANSDELL. I imagine not; but if we had the whole Atlantic Ocean sweeping into the Ambrose Channel it would be a different proposition. That is what happens at Boston.

Mr. BURTON. Well, the further point must be taken into account that the tide is 3 feet more at Boston, though somewhat uncertain, than it is at New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not understood the Senator as criticizing that $400,000 item.

Mr. BURTON. There is one point of criticism in it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had understood the Senator to be sending for the report in order to refresh his memory. The facts in that report are tolerably familiar, I think, both to him and to myself. What I desired to know was whether the Senator meant now to disapprove of the appropriation for that new project.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from North Carolina and others from the very start have adhered to the recommendation of the Board of Engineers. One criticism that I have made of this bill and the present system is its policy—the piecemeal system which pervades it. Let us see what the engineers say about this project in the last two lines before the signature of the chief:

The initial appropriation should be $400,000 in cash, with contract authorization for the remainder.

There is no contract authorization for the remainder, $1,145,000. Is there not ground for criticism there?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is only $400,000 appropriated here. That is the cash appropriation recommended by the Chief of Engineers. The authorization is not included. I know the Senator is not in favor of the plan of adopting these large authorizations, but what I desired to get from the Senator was whether he does now disapprove of that particular item in the bill and to know——

Mr. BURTON. I would not put it in unless there was a contract authorization. I do not believe in making these partial appropriations. There is a recommendation, as I understand it, in the Engineers' Report, in the last line but one of section 3, for building a dredging plant. That is a part of the total cost of $1,545,000.

The next harbor to which I invited attention was that of Mobile. This has been quite an expensive proposition—$6,188,000, with a traffic of 2,210,000 tons. The improved channel is 33½ miles long, 5 miles through Mobile River, the harbor proper, and the rest in the bay. There is a depth of 26 feet, and the project is 27 feet.

The difficulty with this channel is to make it permanent. Constant dredging is required. It must be said of this locality that in recent years there has been a very gratifying increase in the volume of commerce, especially with the West Indies and Central American States, together with a considerable increase in its foreign commerce.

St. Johns River to Jacksonville: The distance from the bar is 27½ miles. The existing project provides for a channel 30 feet deep, of which 40 per cent was completed the 30th of June, 1913. To this several years ago was added another project, which, it seems to me, is in violation of the best rules, and that is an authorization or the adoption of a project costing $586,300 for dredging the river opposite the city. There is a very wide difference, apparent to anyone, between a channel brought in from the sea 27½ miles up to the city, that makes of the city an ocean port, and another project in which you go near to private property where wharves are or can be located and dredge in that place.

I submit, Mr. President, that a rational distinction between the duties and responsibilities of the Federal Government and the municipality would direct that the Government do its part in bringing that channel up to the municipality, and then, if the municipality wishes to use it, let it do its own dredging in front of or opposite its water front, just as it constructs its own wharves.

There is a practical side to this. Many times the pressure from the owners of wharf front—the interest they may arouse—is greater than the demand for the excavation of a great channel that will place a city in connection with the sea. There was a potent private interest advocating Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channel in New York Harbor, useful as they have been to the commerce of New York. I have this to say, that when the New York projects were first adopted in 1899 there was quite as much, if not more, pressure for Bay Ridge than there was for that magnificent channel now known as the Ambrose Channel, which gave the harbor of New York access to the sea with a channel 40 feet in depth.

Mr. RANSDELL. Did I understand the Senator as objecting to that portion of the project at Jacksonville in the St. Johns River opposite the city?

Mr. BURTON. It is opposite the city, as I understand it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is it not a fact that that project was adopted in the act of 1907, and that we do not carry any appropriation for it in this bill?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think so. I read from the report of the Chief of Engineers at page 582:

St. Johns River, Fla., opposite the city of Jacksonville.

* * * * * * *

The original project, which is also the existing project, was adopted by the river and harbor act of March 2, 1907——

Mr. BURTON. Possibly that is so.

Mr. RANSDELL (reading):

and provides for dredging to a depth of 24 feet at mean low water.

Mr. BURTON. I remember the circumstances now that my attention is called to it. It was a Senate amendment. It never originated in the House.

Mr. RANSDELL. But it was in the act of 1907.

Mr. BURTON. That is true.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is an ideal act.

Mr. BURTON. I shall have to take upon myself a part of the responsibility for that, but it never originated in the House.

The next harbors I will merely refer to. Those are the Cape Fear to Wilmington. The distance to the ocean is 30 miles and the depth over the bar is 26 feet. The act of 1912 provides for that channel.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Would it interfere with the remarks of the Senator from Ohio if I should ask that we proceed now with the trust legislation?

Mr. BURTON. I am agreeable to anything that suits the rest of the Senate.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand there are now three trust measures before the Senate. Two have been reported and I think the other is in the chairman's hip pocket ready to be reported at any hour.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask where the chairman's hip pocket is?

Mr. BORAH. I think he took it with him. He just went out of the door.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest that before we proceed to a discussion of the three measures we had better get him here.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, we did not understand on this side the request made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. My request is that the trade commission bill be laid before the Senate and that we proceed with the trust legislation.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator mean the commission bill which has been pending?

Mr. BORAH. The trade commission bill. I understand there are three trust measures now practically before the Senate.

Some of us do not wish to pass those bills without some discussion and we want to get through with them and get acquainted with our constituents.

Mr. KERN. I have sent for the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has charge of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. We are very anxious to have the river and harbor bill proceeded with and it is now before the Senate in regular order. I see no reason why we should lay it aside. I do not believe it is in order for the Senator from Idaho to take the Senator from Ohio off his feet to make an address or to seek to take up another measure. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BORAH. It is the regular order under the rule of the Senate for a Senator to talk about anything he wants to. But I have no desire, Mr. President, to avail myself of the privilege which the rule gives me of discussing the trust measure when the river and harbor bill is before the Senate. Undoubtedly under the rules I could do that if I desired, but I do not think it is good practice, and I do not want to indulge in it.

However, I am severely in earnest when I say that I do want to offer some suggestions as to this trust legislation. The three bills are now before the Senate practically, and I suggest in good faith that those in charge of this legislation bring the matter before the Senate and let us proceed to the discussion and the disposition of those things which we are held here to discuss and dispose of.

I ask the Senators if they will not lay aside the bill before the Senate and let us proceed with the trade commission bill. There is a method by which we can proceed to the trust legislation anyway, but I do not desire to do that. If the Senators in charge of the measures are not going to lay them before the Senate to-day, when are they going to do it?

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he yielded the floor to the Senator from Idaho to make a speech? The Senator from Ohio was making an address on the river and harbor bill. I did not understand that he yielded the floor to the Senator from Idaho in order that he might make an address or take him off his feet.

Mr. BURTON. I yielded the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly the Senator from Ohio can take care of himself.

Mr. BURTON. I yielded the floor and expressed to the Senator from Idaho that if he desired to proceed I was entirely willing to yield. That is the simple fact; but I do not see that that question between the Senator from Idaho and myself is one of general concern to the Senate, provided we both proceed in order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to know if it is in order for a Senator to move, or, if he did not move, to ask to take up another bill when one bill, the river and harbor bill, is regularly before the Senate and is being debated by the Senator from Ohio. If the Senator from Idaho wants to speak upon the river and harbor bill or some other bill, I presume he has a right to do it if the Senator from Ohio yields the floor. I do not understand that he has yielded the floor; perhaps he has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the river and harbor bill is the regular order until some other bill is brought before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I can proceed to discuss the trade commission bill with this bill before the Senate, as I said, but I do not desire to do that. I want the trust bills laid before the Senate, so that we may make progress and discuss them and dispose of them. We can vote on the trade commission bill within a very short time, in my judgment, if it is put before the Senate now. I understood the only reason for holding it back was for the report upon the other bills, and one of the other bills has been reported, and I understand the other is ready to be reported.

In the middle of last week I was in the midst of the discussion of the trade commission bill, and at the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] I yielded the floor in the middle of my remarks. I have not since undertaken to take the floor, because the chairman of the committee said that it was desirable that all bills be reported, and I have yielded until this hour.

Now the time has come when the bills have been reported, and I feel that in good faith I may ask that the bill be laid before the Senate and we may proceed to carry out the President's program and enact the trust legislation and go home.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is correct in his statement that the antitrust bill has been reported to the Senate. It was reported this morning, but it has not yet been laid before the Senate as a printed document. I do not suppose it has been printed except for the use of the committee. I have seen no copy of the bill as amended upon my desk.

I do not suppose that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who is in charge of the trust bill, is ready yet to call it up. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who is in charge of the trade commission bill, advised me this morning through a messenger to proceed with the river and harbor bill, and I had it laid before the Senate with that understanding. Of course, if the Senator from Ohio yields the floor, the Senator from Idaho can make his speech upon the unfinished business with reference to the trade commission bill.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have understood that it was the desire of Senators that before we proceed with the discussion of the legislative program all the bills should be before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we were advised more than 90 days ago that it was exceedingly important that we proceed with all due dispatch, considering the necessity of discussion, to the passage of these measures; and while there is no disposition to take measures from under the control of those who control them, we are just as anxious to dispose of them, however they may be disposed of, as the other side, and we want to dispose of them, and then we think there will be a chance to adjourn and go home. We are kept here for the purpose of passing those three measures. Those three measures can not be passed without some discussion upon them. In a few days they will be laid before the Senate and then there will be the crack of the whip to pass them at once in order that business may no longer be disturbed. The quicker they are put before the Senate the more speedily they can be passed, and I do not see any reason why they should not come before the Senate at this time.

I therefore move, Mr. President, that we proceed to the consideration of House bill 15613, known as the trade commission bill, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that there is no opposition to the consideration of this bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call has begun.

Mr. KERN. There is no opposition to the consideration of the bill, and there is no use to take up time by calling the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. THOMAS (when Mr. BRYAN'S name was called). The junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] are absent from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLLIS. My pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is transferred to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. Under the terms of my pair I have a right to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I announce my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and voted "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] having voted, I withdraw my vote and announce my pair.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 6, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator from Idaho wish to proceed with his remarks now, or will he prefer that we should consider amendments?

Mr. BORAH. It is immaterial to me. If the Senator from Nevada prefers to proceed with the bill and consider amendments, I will make my remarks later. I will be at the convenience of the chairman.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have one amendment considered, but as the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is not here——

Mr. KENYON. The senior Senator from Iowa is on his way here from his office.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will await the coming of the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Idaho can proceed.

Mr. BORAH. I will ask the chairman, then, to entertain the Senate while he is waiting, because I do not want to begin my speech and then stop.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. BORAH. I said I do not desire to begin my remarks and then cease as soon as the Senator from Iowa comes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will not interrupt the Senator, of course. The Senator can proceed.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I should be very glad to occupy the time until the Senator from Iowa gets here, if it is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I am prepared to go ahead, unless the Senator from Nevada desires to take up the bill and proceed with the amendments, and so forth. If general discussion is now to be had, I am prepared to proceed. Otherwise, I will give way, if the Senator from Nevada wants to take up the bill for action on amendments when the Senator from Iowa returns to the Chamber.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hope the Senator from Idaho will proceed.

[Mr. BORAH addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Idaho if it will be convenient for him to suspend his remarks for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad to suspend.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 23, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 22, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our hearts turn to Thee, Eternal God, our heavenly Father, for a renewal of our faith, hope, and confidence in Thine almightiness, that we may bend our wills to Thine, put our souls into our work, assured that Thy providence shall shape it to Thy purposes, thus making us instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of Thy plans.

"Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsels of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful: But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in His law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." So may we live, work, and prosper. In the spirit of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPOSITION AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The SPEAKER. With the indulgence of the House, the Chair wishes to make a statement in respect to the vote taken yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment in respect to a Government building at the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco was concurred in, and to lay that motion on the table. The vote should have been taken first on the motion to lay on the table, but, as a matter of fact, it was taken on the motion to reconsider. Ordinarily it would suggest itself immediately to the Chair or to anyone else. For instance, if A made the motion to reconsider and B made the motion to lay on the table, of course the vote on the last motion would be taken first; but owing to the confusion yesterday the vote was taken first on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MANN. There were two motions?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and the same Member made both of them, but in the confusion, after the severance was ordered, the vote was taken on the motion to reconsider.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state the reason why I make this request. To-morrow, in addition to considering the sundry civil appropriation bill, there is a conference report on the general deficiency bill to be considered, with one item undisposed of. If we meet at 11 o'clock it will enable the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to leave the city on a very important matter; otherwise these bills must necessarily go over until next week.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will withhold my objection for a moment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Senator MARTIN of Virginia is required to leave the city to-morrow at 3 o'clock because of family reasons. If we can meet at 11 o'clock, we can probably have action on both of these reports, and be able to dispose of whatever additional conference is necessary before he is compelled to leave the city; otherwise it may be necessary that these bills go over until next week.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I feel very much inclined, in view of what took place here yesterday afternoon, to object, and I would do so if it were not for the special reason which the gentleman from New York gives. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] objects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen withdraw their objections. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

USE OF REVENUE CUTTERS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes in reply to the letter from Secretary McAdoo in respect to the use of revenue cutters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MURDOCK. Who objected?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CANTOR].

Mr. MURDOCK. Can a gentleman object while he keeps his seat?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York got about half way up. [Laughter].

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects. Of course the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas is well taken. A Member can not from his seat make objection, but as a matter of fact the gentleman from New York had gotten half way up.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Speaker, it has just been explained to me that there is some criticism in the letter of Secretary McAdoo of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, we will end this matter right here. I object, and I am going to stick to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

ELLEN M. STONE RANSOM FUND.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, in view of these rapid-fire objections on both sides of the Chamber, I have not the temerity to undertake to ask any indulgence of the House in taking time to address it at this time, especially upon this sacred day of Calendar Wednesday; but I would like to have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and it will be the second time during my entire service in this House that I have ever asked that privilege. In order that the House may know upon what subject I wish to extend my remarks, I wish to say that it is not only in keeping a promise I made to one who represents many others who are interested in this proposed legislation, but in its observance there is a good deal of pleasure upon my part. I want to get the matter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tomorrow for another reason, because there are at least 40 per cent of new membership in the personnel of the House as compared with that of the last Congress; and, if I may carry the comparison further, I might say that during my service, involving almost six years, there has been such a change in the personnel of the House that only about one-third of the Members of the present Congress were Members of the Sixty-first Congress. It is because the subject, on that account, is quite new to so many Members of the House that I want briefly to say that, while it is in behalf and support of a measure that has four times passed the Senate, yet it has never been in any way more than merely mentioned on this floor, though at least once being favorably reported out by the Committee on Claims. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the reimbursement to the contributors to the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund. I do not know how many here are familiar with that case, now almost ancient history, the stirring scenes of which were laid in Macedonia over a dozen years ago; but involving, as it does, a question that, it seems to me, is very close to our national honor, favorable action on which has been recommended by three distinguished Secretaries of State under three different administrations, and which, as I have said, has four times passed the Senate. I wish, therefore, to have an opportunity to include in the RECORD in extension of my remarks matter that shall set forth some of the documents, reports, and other facts bearing upon that particular case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like simply to make this remark: I do not always approve of the appointments made by the President of the United States, or probably those of any other President since I have been here; but I think we, all of us, can compliment and congratulate the President upon the selection from this House of one of its ablest Members to represent this country in France. [Applause.] While we shall miss him here, we know that the country will be represented to its full height abroad while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] represents us as our ambassador to France. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP]?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to object, but I should like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP], in view of the fact that he will soon separate himself from this House, where we have enjoyed and appreciated him, shall have 10 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Ohio does not want the time.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman from Ohio does not want the time——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman from Ohio expected to ask the House to be permitted to make this address as a sort of valedictory, and he was somewhat——

Mr. BUTLER. Embarrassed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Somewhat diffident about doing so, in view of the objection which was made to another request. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] is about to quit the House, and I hope the House will not object to his making a final speech.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires to address the House, I have no objection whatever, but I am sure the gentleman from Ohio would not desire to address the House for only 10 minutes on the Ellen M. Stone proposition. Before the matter came up he informed me that he desired to extend his remarks in the RECORD on that subject. I should be very glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be given 10 minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, thanking the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania very sincerely for their kindness and courtesy, the gentleman from Illinois is entirely right. I do not want any time in which to address the House upon this matter. The House has already been very generous to me in giving me this opportunity to extend my remarks in the RECORD; but I certainly would appreciate about two minutes time in which to thank not only the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for his very kind and gracious words, but also the entire membership of this House for the many courtesies that they have uniformly extended to me. The pleasant associations made on both sides of the dividing aisle during my service here will always be the happiest within my memory. Just before coming in here I was telling the distinguished Speaker, in his room, that the longer I remained a Member of this House the more I was impressed with the valuable and life-long lessons that such an association brings to a Member. It broadens his views of good citizenship and, above everything else, brightens within his heart the fires of a patriotic love of his country. I do not know that I can carry away with me a scene more inspiring than that when, on occasions, I have walked through the long corridor and looked across the rotunda from the Senate side and on down the long vista, extending beyond to the portal of this Chamber, and saw at the far end the American flag above the Speaker's desk, and then just below it the imposing figure of one whom we all honor and respect, a man who embodies in his sterling qualities of character and intellect the highest conception of American citizenship. [Applause.] And if I may add to the picture that other inspiring sight, a scene which I do not think is duplicated in any other legislative assembly on the face of the earth—the magnificent portrait of George Washington, the Father of his Country, at the Speaker's right, and there on his left that other compatriot, Lafayette, symbolical of the long friendship that has existed between the peoples of these two great Republics. [Applause.] I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, not having in mind the purpose of reviewing at any length the circumstances surrounding the capture by Turkish brigands of Miss Stone, her long imprisonment by them, and her final release, I shall content myself with merely setting forth those facts, now largely a matter of official record, which to my mind clearly demand favorable action upon the bill providing for reimbursement to the contributors to the ransom fund by the payment of which she was finally released. Indeed, though more than 12 years have elapsed since the harrowing experiences of this devoted woman occurred, yet we must all vividly recall the main incidents connected with her capture and final release, for the whole case was of such a sensational nature as to attract the attention of the people of every civilized nation; particularly was this true of our own people. It was this widespread sympathy and concern for her safety that undoubtedly led Mr. Hay, then Secretary of State, to telegraph under date of October 3, 1901, to the Rev. Judson Smith, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, at Boston, as follows:

It seems imperative that the amount (of the ransom) should be raised or pledged, so as to be available by your treasurer at Constantinople in season to save Miss Stone. Statutory prohibitions make it impossible for this Government to advance the money or guarantee its payment.

If paid by Miss Stone's friends, every effort will be made to obtain reimbursement from whichever Government may be found responsible under international law and precedent. In the event of its proving impossible to hold any foreign Government responsible for the capture and to secure the repayment of the money, this Government is willing in the last resort to urge upon Congress as strongly as possible to appropriate money to repay the missionaries.

While in fairness to those who may claim that the contributions to the fund for Miss Stone's release were entirely voluntary and were not made with the hope of return upon the strength of this telegram, yet it is, to say the least, a matter of marked coincidence that within a very few days after its wide publication throughout the country contributions came pouring in during the following two weeks. A list of such contributors shows that upward of 2,200 generously responded, sending all the way from a few cents up to $5,000 each, aggregating a total of approximately $75,000. Though naturally a considerable bulk of the sum total of contributions came from Boston and vicinity, yet in looking over the list I find that nearly every State in the Union was represented by some of those contributors. All of this money up to the amount agreed upon was quickly sent over to the brigands as a ransom for Miss Stone's release.

Congress, not being in session at the time, could not be appealed to to authorize an appropriation for the payment of this ransom, even if inclined so to do. While undoubtedly Secretary Hay had in mind at the time some recourse for its ultimate payment by the Turkish Government, yet for reasons evidently satisfactory to him and to his successor in office, these claims were never pressed to a successful conclusion. The matter therefore rests, it seems to me, entirely with the American Congress to afford the relief which the State Department unequivocally at the time stated it would be urged to do in the last sentence of the telegram which I have quoted.

More than six years elapsed after the sending of this telegram before any official action was taken by our Government looking to the acknowledgment of its liability on account of the obligation assumed by the promises therein contained. On the 21st day of March, 1908, President Roosevelt sent to the Senate the following message:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a letter from the Secretary of State on the subject of the repayment to the contributors of the money raised to pay the ransom for the release of Miss Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary to Turkey, who was abducted by brigands on September 3, 1901, while traveling on the highway from Raslog to Djumabala in the Turkish Empire.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 26, 1908.

The letter of Secretary Root, which was transmitted by President Roosevelt, reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 24, 1908.

The PRESIDENT:

As will be remembered, Miss Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary to Turkey, was abducted by brigands on September 3, 1901, while traveling on the highway from Raslog to Djumabala in the Turkish Empire.

Our diplomatic and consular representatives in Turkey, in correspondence with the Department of State, shortly after the capture, indicated their belief that the motive therefor was to obtain a ransom, and stated that they had requested the Turkish officials to abstain from too close pursuit of the brigands, lest the death of the captured might result.

From later correspondence with our representatives it appeared that the brigands had retired to the mountains with the captive, probably over the border into Bulgaria. The exact location of the party during the captivity, however, is not established by any evidence in the possession of the Department of State, nor does it appear clearly of what Government the bandits were subjects.

About October 1, 1901, the bandits opened negotiations for a ransom, demanding £25,000, and transmitting a letter from Miss Stone, asking that the sum demanded be paid and that pursuit of the brigands by the Turkish troops be stopped.

Our diplomatic representatives were of the opinion that Miss Stone's release could only be obtained by the payment of the ransom, and the State Department shared this view. Miss Stone's friends, of course, entered into correspondence with the department regarding the payment of the ransom, and were told that it must be raised by private means.

On October 3, 1901, the State Department telegraphed to the Rev. Judson Smith, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Boston, Mass., as follows:

"It seems imperative that the amount (of the ransom) should be raised or pledged, so as to be available by your treasurer at Constantinople in season to save Miss Stone. Statutory provisions make it impossible for this Government to advance the money or guarantee its payment. If paid by Miss Stone's friends, every effort will be made to obtain reimbursement from whichever Government may be found responsible under international law and precedent. In the event of its proving impossible to hold any foreign Government responsible for the capture and to secure the repayment of the money, this Government is willing in the last resort to urge upon Congress as strongly as possible to appropriate money to repay the contributors."

It is claimed that this assurance given by the department in its dispatch to Mr. Smith, to the effect that, as a last resort, a recommendation would be made to Congress looking toward the appropriation of a sum sufficient to pay the donors, was largely instrumental in enabling Miss Stone's friends to secure the sum of $66,000, which was raised through public subscription in this country by October 23, 1901, for the purpose of effecting Miss Stone's release.

After negotiations of considerable length the brigands finally consented to accept the amount raised, and arrangements were made by United States Minister Leishman for the payment of the money at a point near Bansko, Macedonia, the Turkish authorities consenting to withhold their troops from the vicinity of the place in order that the negotiations might have a successful issue.

The release of the captive was not obtained so soon as expected, but was finally reported by Minister Leishman on February 23, 1902.

After careful consideration of all the facts my predecessor, Mr. Hay, decided on January 19, 1905, that it was not advisable to attempt to hold the Turkish Government responsible for the capture and to secure the repayment of the money. Upon the subsequent application for reconsideration of this decision Mr. Hay again, on April 11, 1905, reaffirmed the judgment which he had originally expressed. Upon a further review of the same subject I have come to the conclusion that it is not advisable to reverse or change the conclusion which Mr. Hay reached.

It would seem, therefore, that the executive department is bound to make good its promise to recommend to Congress that money be appropriated to repay the ransom money, a promise which was probably relied upon by many of those who contributed of their private means to save the life of an American citizen believed to be in the gravest peril.

Accordingly I have the honor to advise that Congress be recommended to appropriate an amount sufficient to repay the contributors.

Respectfully submitted.

ELIHU ROOT.

As a result of this renewed agitation a bill providing an appropriation sufficient to reimburse all the contributors to Miss Stone's ransom fund was passed by the Senate in the Sixtieth, Sixty-first, Sixty-second, and the Sixty-third Congresses. More than this, a similar bill was favorably reported out by the House Committee on Claims by Chairman Prince, which set forth at some length the reasons that justified that committee in making a favorable report. That report in part reads as follows:

The committee has carefully gone over this case, and find that Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary to Turkey, was abducted by brigands on September 3, 1901, while traveling on the highway from Raslog to Djumabala, in the Turkish Empire. Friends contributed for her ransom, and were led to believe by correspondence with the State Department that the ransom money so contributed would be returned, either by obtaining it from Turkey or from the Treasury of the United States.

Messrs. Kidder, Peabody & Co., bankers, Boston, Mass., became the custodians of this fund, and furnished to the committee a list of the names and addresses of the original givers or their accredited representatives.

The committee finds that there are 2,264 givers to this fund.

Hereto attached and made a part of this report is a message from former President Roosevelt and former Secretary of State ELIHU ROOT and the list of the contributors.

The committee insists that the amount favored by them, of $66,000, shall be in full of all claims of every kind and character, and so accepted by the contributors who receive the money from the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of this bill.

The committee desires this appropriation of $66,000 to make an end to all legislation desired by the contributors to the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund.

Unfortunately the parliamentary status of the House bill became such that its consideration upon this floor could not be had, and to this day, as I have stated, there has never been more than the slightest reference to its merits made in this House. It is for that reason that I am very hopeful that such attention may be attracted to the merits of the measure as to at least call for its free and open discussion.

In order to conform to the chronological order of events as they have to do with the history of this measure, I have thus far only quoted from the letters of Secretary of State Hay and Secretary of State ROOT, but I am pleased, in support of my contention that this bill ought to pass, to be able now to quote from a very recent letter from our distinguished Secretary of State, William J. Bryan, who, on the 15th instant, wrote to Representative EDWARD W. POU, chairman of the Committee on Claims, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Claims,
House of Representatives.

SIR: At the request of Miss Ellen M. Stone, the American missionary who was abducted by Turkish brigands in 1901, the department desires to call attention to the message of President Roosevelt to the Congress March 26, 1908, transmitting the letter of Secretary ROOT on the subject of repayment by the Government to the contributors of the money raised to pay the ransom for the release of Miss Stone, amounting to $66,000. It appears that the Department of State announced in 1901, while Miss Stone was in the hands of the brigands, that if the ransom were raised and paid by private persons every effort would be made to obtain reimbursement from the Government, which might be found impossible to hold any foreign government responsible, the department was willing to urge that Congress appropriate money to repay the contributors. Subsequent investigation appeared to show the irresponsibility of any foreign government, and therefore the department takes this occasion again to recommend that Congress make such appropriation.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. J. BRYAN.

To which Representative POU sent the following letter under date of the 18th:

JULY 18, 1914.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Acknowledging receipt of yours of the 15th instant, I beg to say that S. 1864, for the relief of the contributors of the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund, is now before this committee for consideration.

Personally I have always favored the return of this money, and this committee made a favorable report on the bill for the refunding of this money during the Sixty-second Congress.

Faithfully, yours, CHAIRMAN.

While perhaps the international questions involved have no pertinency at this time inasmuch as the State Department has for satisfactory reasons seen proper to no further press these claims, yet there is to my mind an undoubted obligation on the part of Congress after these long years to do not the generous but the just thing to those who, upon the suggestion of the State Department—not to put it any stronger—came forward to release a subject of this country from the Turkish outlaws. And the fact that several other foreign nations within a few years, both before and after Miss Stone's capture, demanded and received satisfaction from the Turkish Government for similar outrages to their own subjects, does not excuse this Government from reimbursing its own citizens for the contributions which brought about Miss Stone's release, resulting undoubtedly in the saving of no little embarrassment in our international relations with Turkey.

Miss Stone had been for many years doing a noble work as a missionary in Turkey. It was in the famous capital of that Empire that, more than 40 years before her unfortunate experiences there, a noble educational institution had been founded by an American interested in a similar work. Indeed, what higher praise can be bestowed upon the work of our foreign missions in any land than the founding of such an institution as Robert College, the outgrowth of the early mission work in a country whose needs so strongly appealed to its founders. Of that institution the late W. T. Stead, mourned among the lost of the Titanic disaster, wrote more than a dozen years ago as follows:

That American college is to-day the chief hope of the future of the millions who inhabit the Sultan's dominions. They have 200 students in the college to-day, but they have trained and sent out into the world thousands of bright, brainy young fellows who have carried the leaven of the American town meeting into all Provinces of the Ottoman Empire.

But it is not alone in Turkey that the splendid work of these noble men and women has borne such fruit; for may we not in all truth point to the great governmental reforms that, at the end of more than 50 years of mission work in China, have awakened the people of that mighty country to the civilizing influences of the popular republican form of government.

To those who may fear that the enactment of this measure into a law may establish a harmful precedent for the future I wish to say that I have no fear of such result. It is, in fact, the only case to my mind upon which Congress has been called to act involving such conditions. But is it not true that during almost every term of Congress we have legislated not only to pay for outrages committed by our own outlaws upon foreign subjects, but we have likewise demanded and received reparation for similar outrages committed upon our own citizens in other lands? There would seem to me to be certainly no difference in principle from Congress paying to reimburse its own citizens when our Government has failed to secure payment from the offending nation than to make payment, as has been our practice in many instances, to foreign Governments because of the outrages committed by our own citizens. If, again, it is claimed that the payment of this money would in any way benefit Miss Stone, the one who of all others is most interested to see justice done, let me say, for the information of this House, that she has assured me that not a single dollar of such reimbursement would go to her. Above all, the one who has spent so many of her best years in this noble missionary work must feel that the honor of our Nation is involved, and to my mind she is entirely right in that view of the matter.

USE OF REVENUE CUTTERS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. GOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asks unanimous consent to address the House.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I made some remarks in criticism of the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, because of the unlawful use of revenue cutters. Those remarks were spoken on the floor of the House. On the 18th there was printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, criticizing me for words spoken on the floor of the House. From that criticism I read the following:

Please allow me to thank you for having so effectively replied to the statements of Mr. GOOD, which I can ascribe only to utter ignorance on his part of the law and the long-standing custom of the department, or to wanton misrepresentation.

Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday the Secretary of the Treasury, William G. McAdoo, caused to be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter addressed to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in which he attempts to justify his unauthorized and unlawful use of revenue cutters.

It was not necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to remind Congress or any of its Members of the great benefits derived from the Revenue-Cutter Service. Congress has long recognized the great importance of this service and has annually appropriated all that has been estimated as necessary for its continuance. Nor was it necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to point out that it is no violation of law for him to go aboard a revenue cutter for the purpose of familiarizing himself with his duties.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. To make the point that the gentleman is not speaking to a question of personal privilege but instead is scolding the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair thinks that the phrase in there, "wanton misrepresentation," constitutes a question of personal privilege. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is a sort of delicate circumlocutionary way of calling a man a liar. [Laughter and applause.] The Chair as long as he is in this chair is not going to permit outsiders to infringe upon the privileges of any Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Treasury is the head of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and it is his duty to become familiar with the needs and details of that service. Such a use of the revenue cutters by the Secretary of the Treasury should receive our warm commendation. It was no such use of revenue cutters that I complained of. It was the unauthorized and unlawful private use of which I then complained and which I now condemn.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to analyze this very remarkable letter of Secretary McAdoo's, for when it is squared with the facts it shows not only a violation of the law by the Secretary of the Treasury, but it shows a willful violation of the act of June 7, 1884, which provides that "hereafter revenue cutters shall be used exclusively for public service and in no way for private purposes."

In his letter Secretary McAdoo states:

Mr. GOOD says: "It is a notorious fact that every Friday or thereabouts at this time of the year the revenue-cutter Prairie leaves Boston, comes to Washington, and is loaded down with Democratic officials, and they are taken for a cruise down the Potomac at Government expense." This statement is utterly without foundation.

I confess to two inaccuracies in my statement. I was misinformed as to the name of the revenue cutter which I then had in mind, and inadvertently gave the starting point at Boston instead of Baltimore, but these were immaterial parts of the statement which the Secretary of the Treasury says "is utterly without foundation."

The facts are that the revenue cutter Apache during this entire summer has been leaving Baltimore on Friday, reaching Washington Saturday morning, and leaving Washington Saturday afternoon loaded with Democratic officeholders and politicians, selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and his assistants for a cruise down the Potomac. The Apache returns to Washington Monday morning, discharges her precious cargo, and leaves for Baltimore, where she arrives on Tuesday. The Secretary in his letter justifies this practice in the following language:

In all such instances officers of the Government have been permitted to use the revenue cutters only when it did not interfere with the proper cruising arrangements of the vessels.

Here we are told by Secretary McAdoo that officers of the Government are permitted to use revenue cutters for private purposes the law to the contrary notwithstanding, "when it did not interfere with the proper cruising arrangements of the vessels." With the power of making all "cruising arrangements of the vessels" in Secretary McAdoo and his assistants, when, pray, will the desire of William G. McAdoo for an ocean voyage in a revenue cutter at Government expense be prevented because of "cruising arrangements of the vessels" made by Secretary McAdoo? Such an interpretation renders this provision of the law not only nugatory but it is silly. The trouble with the Secretary's explanation is that it explains nothing. In the first place, the law absolutely prohibits such junkets in revenue cutters. "Cruising orders" have nothing to do with the observance and enforcement of this law. They should be given with respect to the law and not in defiance of the law. In the second place, "cruising orders" for the revenue cutter Apache were given by Secretary McAdoo or his assistants. She was scheduled for these unlawful summer junkets down the Potomac by the Secretary of the Treasury. By a study of her schedule you will observe that she is able to perform practically no other service, for she leaves Baltimore on Fridays and returns the following Tuesdays, leaving only Wednesdays and Thursdays to take on supplies for the next junket and to perform the public business.

I am told that because of this unlawful use of the Apache the members of the crew have had no gun practice all summer. They have been overworked in carrying out the orders of Secretary McAdoo for these unlawful junkets, and they have a right to be dissatisfied.

It is important to know that Government business requiring a revenue cutter to take the friends of the administration for a cruise down the Potomac is on the wane. At any rate, for the first time in months she failed to make her regular trip last Saturday. [Applause on Republican side.] Why should she fail to make her regular trip on the first Saturday following the disclosure on the floor of the House of this unlawful use of revenue cutters? What is the matter of the "proper cruising arrangements of the vessels"?

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe her boilers were leaking.

Mr. GOOD. Strange, indeed, that this important public business down the Potomac should be so suddenly completed, and the use of revenue cutters in these waters so ruthlessly terminated right in the face of the approaching dog days.

The Secretary further states that:

On the occasion to which Mr. GOOD refers, namely, July 5, 1914, I did arrive at Mattapoisett, Mass., on the revenue cutter Onondaga. The Onondaga was under cruising orders, and I accompanied her on that cruise. Every item of expense occasioned by my presence and that of my wife was paid by me.

Mr. MADDEN. And for the coal and the oil?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Having previously stated in his letter that his presence on revenue cutters was in performance of his official duties, he would have Congress and the country believe that he was on the Onondaga because his official duties called him there. Now, what are the facts? Secretary and Mrs. McAdoo have their summer home at Mattapoisett, Mass., which can be reached from Washington by water. They were here and desired to go to their summer home. An ocean trip on a steam yacht unquestionably looked inviting. By a rather strange coincidence, just as the Secretary and Mrs. McAdoo were ready to start for Mattapoisett, the revenue cutter Onondaga, pursuant to "cruising orders," was also ready to leave Washington for Mattapoisett, a village of 1,200 on the Massachusetts coast. Of course the Onondaga was on Government business. But the Secretary's statement that he paid for his meals on the trip causes a little confusion. If Secretary McAdoo was on official business, as claimed, why should he have been compelled to pay for his meals? If he was called from Washington on official business why should not the Government pay for his meals? On the contrary, he was using that revenue cutter as a private yacht for private purposes. This being true, he should at least have paid all of the expenses of the voyage. He should have paid not only the trifling expense of his meals, but should have paid all the heavy expenses which were paid by the Government. The fact that he paid for his meals is in itself an acknowledgment that he was not on the Onondaga on official business and that he knew he was violating the law. Why, you ask, should the Government at large expense send this vessel on this long voyage for private purposes in violation of the law for the convenience and comfort of the Secretary of the Treasury? There is one reason why this was done and only one. Secretary McAdoo wanted to go, he wanted to take an ocean voyage at Government expense. He had charge of "the proper cruising arrangements of the vessels." He was willing to violate the law and so he violated it.

Mr. Speaker, the unlawful uses of revenue cutters by Secretary McAdoo justifies a more severe condemnation of his acts than I have attempted to make. The example set by this official only prompts minor officials of the Government to violate the law. This is illustrated by the clipping which I have here from the Times-Dispatch, of Richmond, Va., under date of June 6, 1914, which contains a description of a pleasure trip given by Norman R. Hamilton, at Norfolk, Va., from which I quote:

At Newport News the party was met by Mr. Norman R. Hamilton, collector at Norfolk. Later they were the guests of Mr. Hamilton aboard one of the vessels of the customhouse fleet, and after being shown the interesting points on Hampton Roads were carried to Norfolk.

This morning I received a letter from Massachusetts, and I quote the following:

Why kick on Secretary McAdoo alone? There are others, perhaps. "Everybody is doing it."

[Laughter.]

This is an example of real Democratic economy. These "cruising arrangements" at this season of the year are apparently very popular with at least a great part of this Democratic administration. These voyages in luxurious steam yachts at Government expense have not been denounced by a single Democrat connected with the administration.

Mr. MADDEN. It saves the man using them from going to the expense of purchasing a private yacht.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Illinois has no right to take possession of the floor and interject remarks without the permission of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is entirely correct. [Laughter and applause.] It is a bad habit that Members drift into.

Mr. GOOD. Hence I am led to inquire whether the unlawful and private use of these yachts are intended as a performance of that platform pledge of the Democratic Party wherein it declares:

We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government.

Mr. Speaker, I ask to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of July 21, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an editorial on the same subject from the New York Times. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, bearing on this same subject is an editorial in the New York Times of July 21——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Can the gentleman under the guise of personal privilege and under the ruling of the Chair in regard to "wanton misrepresentation" proceed to read the opinion of all the newspapers in the country or any newspaper on the question of Mr. McAdoo's conduct?

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: The gentleman has a perfect right to read that editorial if he wants to do so under the guise of personal privilege. Of course, the Speaker would not permit an abusive or improper editorial to be read at all; but the gentleman, as long as he keeps within the limits of decent discussion, has a right to read any extract from anything he pleases up until his hour runs out.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Then, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Would the gentleman have a right before arguing or speaking or reading any article——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman can not interrupt the gentleman from Iowa by a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. That is correct, too.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Well, I make the point of order that the editorial the gentleman proposes to read is not germane to the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell until he hears it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the editorial referred to is as follows:

[Editorial from the New York Times, July 21, 1914.]

THE RESEARCHES OF M'ADOO.

Secretary McAdoo's defense against the charge of Congressman GOOD that he has been "joy riding" in revenue cutters is well enough so far as it confines itself to the argument that he has been doing what all his predecessors have done and that he has paid his expenses. But he ceases to be impressive when he undertakes to give the impression that he has been cruising around with his wife in the discharge of his official duties. And he becomes positively humorous when he says:

"On two occasions within the last 17 months when I have been on board revenue cutters rescues were made at sea, and I secured knowledge which I have applied with great advantage to the administration."

[Laughter.]

It is a new idea that the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury require him to go out cruising in Government boats to study the processes by which rescues are made. It conjures up a picture of a dignified statesman industriously making notes as a drowning man is hauled aboard from a sinking boat—and jotting down such memoranda as "Man hauled aboard by rope. Query. Would not stepladder be better? Length of time occupied in climbing side, 50 seconds. Consult efficiency engineer to see if time can not be reduced in future."

Or perhaps Mr. McAdoo means us to understand that he is studying the art of rescue under the impression that his official position calls upon him to perform such duties himself, and he wants to be prepared. If so, he is setting an alarming precedent for his successors. No elderly and sedentary gentleman will wish to become Secretary of the Treasury if he is liable, in the midst of the preparation of a currency bill, to be interrupted with a call to put on his oilskins and slide down the side to man a rescue boat.

Mr. Speaker, some little criticism was made of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] because he rushed to the defense the other day of the Secretary of the Treasury. Everybody here and elsewhere knows that there is no more efficient legislator on either side of this House than the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Few men have acquired the knowledge of appropriations and the expenses of running this Government that has been acquired by the gentleman from New York, but I am a little afraid that he set a precedent the other day that will disturb him when it comes to making appropriations for this Revenue-Cutter Service. It is perfectly natural, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York should defend the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman from New York and Secretary McAdoo come from the same State——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that he is not pursuing his personal-privilege question when he is talking about the gentleman from New York even if he is talking in a complimentary way. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am about through talking in a complimentary way, and I think I will be able to get back to the point. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly natural that the gentleman should rush to his defense. They both come from New York. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars of patronage is at stake in the State of New York, and it is——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to continue his complimentary remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could pronounce an eulogy upon the gentleman from New York at the proper time, but the gentleman from New York is not mixed up with this question of personal privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not want to be. But if the gentleman thinks it helps his case to abuse me, I am so accustomed to it that it will not do any harm.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was complimenting you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did not sound like it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] be permitted to continue the line of talk in which he has been indulging. Is there objection?

Mr. BOOHER and Mr. DONOVAN objected.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] finished with his remarks?

Mr. GOOD. I yield the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] frequently rises in his place and says, "I object, Mr. Speaker," or "Point of order, Mr. Speaker." He never addresses the Chair in accordance with the rules, but the Speaker uniformly sustains him. I call the Speaker's attention to Rule XIV, paragraph 1, where it says:

When any Member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker."

The SPEAKER. That is true; but if the Speaker ruled rigidly in favor of every technicality we would not adjourn until noon on the 4th of March next. Anybody presiding has to inject into these rules the elements of common sense in order to expedite business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary inquiry is whether it is not proper, under the rule to which I have referred, to address "Mr. Speaker" before saying "I object"?

The SPEAKER. That is undoubtedly correct. That is the formula.

Mr. MOORE. Then the gentleman from Connecticut is uniformly out of order in addressing the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair sustains the gentleman from Connecticut half of the time and overrules him half of the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Speaker remarked that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was speaking in complimentary terms of myself. As a former distinguished college professor and president, the Speaker is familiar with that figure of rhetoric known as antithesis. The fact is the gentleman was attempting to build up a straw man by some complimentary remarks in order to lead up to the latter part of his remarks, which, before interrupted, seemed to assume that what I had said on a former occasion in reference to this matter was due to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had a very large amount of patronage at his command, and, as I came from the same State, my action had been thereby influenced. First, let me say, Mr. Speaker, for the Secretary of the Treasury, that his statement about the payment of his expenses while on these cutters is easily understood. The Government does not supply rations to the officers of the revenue cutters. Anyone who boards those vessels for any purpose and partakes of food must either partake of the rations furnished by the Government to the crews of the vessels or, unless he pays or reimburses the mess of the officers for what he consumes, must encroach upon the hospitality of the officers and consume that for which they pay themselves.

I think the statement that a revenue cutter leaves this town every Saturday loaded down with Democratic officeholders and politicians is purely Pickwickian. There is not a boatload of Democratic officeholders in Washington. [Laughter.] The Democratic politicians have been as scarce here as huckleberries in winter. The statements made a week or so ago about the Secretary of the Treasury were made without any advance knowledge on this side. Without having time to investigate, I called attention to what I thought was their preposterous character. My action and my statement were not actuated by any favors I have received from the Secretary of the Treasury, nor by the hope of any favors to be received from him in the future. It may clarify the situation for me to state that while we are of the same party and are cooperating in one administration to carry out the promises of our party as enunciated in its national platform, that I have very little sympathy with the Secretary's views and the Secretary apparently has very little sympathy with my views as to what is desirable to be done in matters of appointments affecting the people I represent or for those in adjoining districts in Congress. It makes no difference to me what the Secretary of the Treasury does with his patronage. So far as the discharge of my official duties are concerned, my actions will not be affected. I have not been the beneficiary of his gratitude or of his favor, and I have no expectation that I will be. But when an official of the Government—Democrat, Republican, or nondescript——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. When I finish this statement—has statements made about him on the floor which reflect upon him in any way, and I believe I can contribute to the general enlightenment of the House, I shall not be deterred from attempting to furnish the information or induced to furnish it because of favor received or denied or hope of future benefit.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman make that statement in view of the publication in the Post this morning, that all the New York Federal patronage has been turned over to and put in charge of Secretary McAdoo?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. It is unfortunate for me, I guess; but I make it just the same.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has intimated again that my conduct has been actuated by that fact. That is a somewhat serious charge; first, because some people will misunderstand the motive actuating me in the discharge of my public duties; and, second, a large number of hopeful persons will misunderstand my ability to aid them in the ambitions they entertain.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. I wish to state once and for all, so far as I am concerned, that with the exception of a $1,200 position in an exempt class and a temporary position for six weeks, which I turned over to one of my colleagues, I have received no patronage from the Treasury Department, and I do not expect to receive any. So that, so far as either obtaining help to assist me politically in the past or hoping to obtain it in the future from the Treasury Department, it has not had the slightest influence in determining me to make the statement that I have made. In view of what I believed—and I do not intend to be offensive—to be unfounded, preposterous, and ridiculous statements of the use of the revenue cutters and which because of familiarity with the service, and my knowledge of the conditions, my confidence in the integrity and high purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury, regardless of any differences of opinion I might have with him politically, I was convinced could not be accurate, I did not hesitate to state my belief. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not know who furnishes the information about these matters. It was intimated the other day that the Secretary of the Treasury had turned a revenue cutter over to his son, so that he might use it for his honeymoon.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As a matter of fact, Mr. McAdoo's son went on his honeymoon on the yacht Marguerite, the property of the father of the young lady whom he married. These little intimations and suggestions are likely to be criticized by people who think that the mere suggestion of a fact is a fact in itself, and it results in gross injustice to men in public life.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker. will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman does not mean to say that I intimated that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I do not mean to say that the suggestion was made by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. Does not the gentleman think now, since he has mentioned that fact. that he ought to state what is reported as having taken place when young Mr. McAdoo and his bride were on that cruise, so far as his father used a revenue cutter to intercept them, and in the early hours of the morning caused a gun, or it may have been 5 guns, or 16 guns, or perhaps 21 guns, to be fired across the bow of the yacht in which young Mr. McAdoo was cruising?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, such was the character of all these statements. The other day I happened to visit the office of the Secretary of the Terasury on a matter of public business affecting my work in the House when he referred to this statement and stated what the facts were—that his son and his wife had made a trip on the yacht Marguerite, the property of a gentleman in Baltimore, the father-in-law of his son. The only possible connection there could be between the suggestion as to the use of the revenue cutter and the fact was that as the Secretary had attended the wedding in Baltimore that day and the revenue cutter Apache was leaving Baltimore on a regularly scheduled trip that night to Washington he had returned to Washington on the revenue cutter.

This new suggestion that the revenue cutter fired guns across the bow of a private yacht, except in the performance of official duty, seems to intimate charges—although there are no charges—that the Secretary of the Treasury could be guilty of descending to such common horseplay that I am unable to believe that a man of his characteristics and culture and attainments could possibly be guilty of. [Applause.] Such statements are unfortunate. If the law is violated at any time, I am perfectly free in my criticism of those who violate it. But I remember that when I was in the minority all the disgruntled soreheads and discontented persons in every branch of the public service were continually furnishing me with what was supposed to be information of grave dereliction of duty on the part of high officials in the Republican administration. I consigned 99.99 per cent of them to the wastebasket. Upon investigation I found out that an infinitesimal fraction of the other one one-hundredth per cent of them had very little foundation. I have not the slightest doubt that this same group of marplots, soreheads, disgruntled, discontented, no-account, don't-want-to-work employees in the Government have now turned their attention to gentlemen on the other side. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman from New York trying to convince his constituents that he has no influence with the administration, or is he afraid that his constituents will think he has some influence with the administration? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The question of whether or not I have any influence with the administration is absolutely of no importance. If I can not be elected to Congress, if I can not stay in Congress because of what I do in the performance of my official duty, I do not want to be here because of the influence of an administration. [Applause.] No administration, no man, nor any person ever controlled or ever will control my acts as an official and as a Member of this body. If I can not remain in public life to represent what I honestly and intelligently believe to be the things that my constituents want, and which I honestly believe should be advocated and done, I am ready to go out. I have a great deal of respect for myself, although a great many others do not always seem to have much. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he agrees with the Secretary of the Treasury that it is no abuse or violation of the law to use revenue cutters for private purposes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say that. The Secretary made no such statement. If I were the Secretary of the Treasury and had the Revenue-Cutter Service in my jurisdiction, which under a previous administration had been criticized and recommended for abolishment, to have its boats scattered among a number of different departments and its functions absorbed by half a dozen, with all the high-brow efficiency experts and reformers and adjusters of governmental affairs insisting that it should be abolished, I should have been sufficiently interested to know something about the personnel and the boats and the manner in which the officers and men performed the functions of the Revenue-Cutter Service to go aboard one occasionally myself and risk the charge that in doing so I was using the cutter for private purposes. [Applause.] Any man who is afraid to do the things that he believes are essential for the proper discharge of his official duties because of the fear that some one may criticize him or charge him with having done an unauthorized act or a wrong act is not fit to hold the office, and he ought to get out. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I would like to have an answer to the question.

Mr. DONOVAN. This is a proposition for unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. You can not take the gentleman off the floor in that way.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, just a suggestion. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] got unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Just how long ago that was I do not know, but it seems much longer ago than——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York got unanimous consent to address the House.

Mr. GARNER. I have no desire to take the gentleman off the floor; but this is Calendar Wednesday, and there are important matters on the calendar affecting Texas and other States, and——

The SPEAKER. It seems that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asked for three minutes, and in that case the gentleman's time expired long ago.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did the Speaker say my time was up?

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute to answer a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] be extended to answer a question. Is there objection?

Mr. BOOHER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To make a proposition for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. DONOVAN. To address the House for 10 minutes on the subject that people who live in glass houses, and mighty thin glass at that, had better be conspicuous by keeping quiet——

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. DONOVAN. I have not stated the proposition yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objected as soon as he heard what it was.

Mr. DONOVAN. I think there are ways of objecting.

FRANCES OWEN LURTON.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is a Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 29) on the Speaker's table. If it is not considered to-day, it can not be considered at all. It will only take a minute or two if the House will agree to consider it, and I ask unanimous consent that it be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is it about?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask that it be read for information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for prior years, and for other purposes, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to insert under the head "Department of Justice, miscellaneous objects," the following item: "To pay to Frances Owen Lurton, widow of Horace Harmon Lurton, late a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, $14,500."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, has the conference report on the general deficiency bill been submitted this morning?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The conference report was submitted this morning.

Mr. MANN. Is it a complete report?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it is not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is one item in disagreement.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is a disagreement on one item.

I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and to the House that I am informed that this same sort of procedure was followed in the case of the widow of Mr. Justice Harlan, and also, if I mistake not, in the case of Mr. Justice Brewer. Mr. Justice Lurton was not a wealthy man, and if this sum is to be paid, it seems to me it would be a very proper mark of respect to his memory to let it go through now, as the Senate unanimously decided ought to be done.

Mr. MANN. I take it, if this resolution goes through now, it will have become the established practice of the Government to appropriate one year's salary to the widow of a deceased Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not know how soon that would extend to the widows of deceased circuit judges, but I think it ought to be——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, I just stated that the same practice was followed in the two cases I have cited.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember in reference to the Brewer case, but I remember in reference to the Harlan case, where there were claimed to be very exceptional circumstances. I do not know what the facts in this case may be. It comes in now purely as a matter of precedent, on the theory that it is following an established custom. I am not willing to do that without having it brought before the House in such a way that it can be considered and voted upon. I do not think we ought to take to-day on this proposition, and if it is opened to discussion it will take the whole day. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House requests for leave of absence, which the Clerk read, as follows:

Mr. SHERWOOD requests leave of absence, indefinitely, to repair vital energies.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois requests leave of absence, for five days, on account of illness.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear those requests. Reserving the right to object, will the Clerk please read them over again?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the requests again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHERWOOD requests leave of absence, indefinitely, to repair vital energies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall not object to that request from Gen. SHERWOOD, but any similar request from anybody else in the House will be objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois requests leave of absence for five days on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MR. SPEAKER: I have this day tendered to the governor of Ohio my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the fourteenth congressional district of Ohio, to take effect on Thursday, July 23, 1914.

Respectfully,

WM. G. SHARP.

EXTENSION OF PAYMENT UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the irrigation bill. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Is the bill open now for amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the bill is open for amendment. We have read the first section.

Mr. COX. The first section has been read?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and I presume it is in order to have the committee amendments to that section read first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there are four committee amendments pending.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask that the committee amendments be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 2, after the word "fund," strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "shall," insert the word "each."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If that amendment is agreed to to perfect the text, will it still be in order to move to strike out the perfected text and insert an amendment in lieu thereof? I take it that is the parliamentary situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite understand the intent of the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. Of course the Chair understands that it is a well-established rule that the House having passed on a matter, an amendment proposing a change can not thereafter be offered. I think that rule has been too strictly enforced, for it has been very strictly enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois was, if after the text had been perfected an amendment could be offered striking out a portion of the paragraph containing the perfected text.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I take it that if this amendment is agreed to it will be in order to strike out that language, including the perfected amendment, and insert other matter.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the ruling of the Chair. If this amendment is adopted to perfect the text, then an amendment will be in order striking out the language, including the perfected text.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in order that this matter may be understood, the House might adopt all the committee amendments, and under the ruling of the Chair just made the gentleman from Illinois might then propose a new section in lieu of this section, restoring the old section as it was in the bill originally. Manifestly, that could not be done under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that if an amendment is offered to perfect a section, that afterwards an amendment striking out the language, including the perfected portion, is in order.

Mr. MONDELL. The Chair does not hold that after amending the section a motion could be made that would undo all that had been done by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that if the amendments were for the purpose of perfecting the section, that after the section was perfected an amendment would be in order striking the section out.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that the Chair can not rule intelligently until we have a concrete case before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment which has been reported by the Clerk.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 6, after the word "remainder," insert the words "shall each be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "available," insert the words "as announced by the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for 30 minutes. I will state that there was an understanding the other day, just before general debate was finished, between the chairman of the committee and the ranking member on this side that they would ask that I should be allowed 30 minutes to discuss the bill generally early in the consideration of the bill to-day. That was done near the close of general debate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in support of the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma that on last Thursday, when the general debate was closed, we did promise that early in the debate to-day we would do our utmost to secure for the gentleman from Oklahoma 30 minutes' time. It was not stipulated whether he should take it all at one time or along during the debate. I tried to persuade the gentleman to take it at different times along through the debate, but nevertheless I want to keep faith with him. He did agree to withdraw objection at that time to closing general debate with the understanding that he should have an opportunity to address the House for 30 minutes, and I hope there will be no objection to his proceeding.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, it was my understanding also that the gentleman should have 30 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Let us have the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object for a moment, I call the attention of the gentleman from Colorado to the fact that I spoke to him abqut having some time, and he indicated to me that personally, as far as he was concerned, I might have it. I should not want more than 10 minutes, and might not use that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I intend to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have some time, but I hope the gentleman will wait until later in the afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am a western man; I live in a Western State; I represent a western district. My sympathies are with the West, and it is with a great deal of reluctance on my part that I rise to criticize some of the features of this bill, and unless the bill shall be amended I will be constrained to vote against it. My objections to this bill arise mainly on account of the manner in which the reclamation fund has been distributed, on account of the way the law has been administered.

In other words, Oklahoma has been discriminated against. The State has not received any benefit under the law, though we have contributed nearly $6,000,000 to the fund.

But some of my objections to the bill are not based upon considerations for my own State or for my own people, but are based upon the highest national interests. There may be some here who are not entirely familiar with the provisions of the original reclamation act, and I want to read section 9 of the original act. It is as follows:

SEC. 9. That it is hereby declared to be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act, so far as the same may be practicable and subject to the existence of feasible irrigation projects, to expend the major portion of the funds arising from the sale of public lands within each State and Territory hereinbefore named for the benefit of arid and semiarid lands within the limits of such State or Territory: Provided, That the Secretary may temporarily use such portion of said funds for the benefit of arid or semiarid lands in any particular State or Territory hereinbefore named as he may deem advisable, but when so used the excess shall be restored to the fund as soon as practicable, to the end that ultimately, and in any event within each 10-year period after the passage of this act, the expenditures for the benefit of the said States and Territories shall be equalized according to the proportions and subject to the conditions as to practicability and feasibility aforesaid.

Mr. Chairman, there are three propositions involved in this section. First, this section makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to use the major portion of the fund derived from any State from the sale of public lands for the benefit of the land within that State; second, the Secretary is authorized temporarily, and only temporarily, to use funds that come from one State to construct a project in another State; third, the object and purpose of all this is declared to be that at the end of every 10-year period the funds derived from all the States shall be equalized among the States, so that each State may receive at least a major part of the funds it has contributed.

How has that been carried out? I have a table here which shows the amount which each State has contributed and the amount that has been expended in each State. The table is as follows:

Receipts to the reclamation fund from sale of public lands in each State and the amount expended on irrigation projects in each State to Apr. 30, 1914, including bond fund.

States.	Receipts from sale of public lands.	Expenditures on irrigation projects.
Arizona	$1,455,000.00	$17,049,211.31
Idaho	5,039,708.90	16,181,170.51
Washington	6,433,299.73	9,475,583.36
Colorado	6,680,991.93	8,837,577.55
Montana	8,588,290.73	8,334,430.39
Nevada	541,596.96	6,781,272.03
Wyoming	4,320,900.46	6,614,027.90
New Mexico	3,939,790.95	6,531,423.80
Nebraska	1,664,013.83	5,797,553.83
Utah	1,890,479.34	4,652,949.61
Oregon	10,413,928.22	4,371,791.08
South Dakota	6,823,778.66	3,219,097.83
California	5,358,943.03	3,073,542.59
Texas		2,817,928.90
North Dakota	11,921,898.43	1,947,467.20
Kansas	963,080.07	376,471.29
Oklahoma	5,783,557.84	72,512.10
Preliminary investigations		80,488.73
General accounts		259,655.99
Total	81,504,919.82	106,374,065.01

This table shows that Arizona has contributed $1,455,000 to the fund, but there has been expended in the State $17,049,000. Idaho has furnished $5,000,000, and has received $16,181,000. Arizona and Idaho together have furnished to the fund $6,500,000, and have received $33,000,000. These two States have received over two-fifths of the entire amount received from the sale of public lands. Washington has contributed $6,500,000 to the fund, and there has been expended in this State $9,500,000. Colorado has contributed $6,558,000 and received $8,837,000. Nevada has contributed only $541,596, but there has been expended in Nevada $6,781,272. Wyoming has contributed $4,320,000, and there has been expended in Wyoming $6,614,000. Oregon has contributed $10,413,000, and there has been expended in Oregon $4,371,000. North Dakota has contributed to the fund $11,921,000, and there has been expended in the State $1,947,000. Oklahoma has contributed $5,783,000 to the reclamation fund, and there has been expended in the State $72,888.99. The amount expended in Oklahoma was spent in surveys and in some experimental work on the North Fork of Red River.

Mr. Chairman, this table shows conclusively that the original law has not been carried out. What was the nature of that law? It should have been regarded in the character of a compact, an agreement, an understanding, a pledge between these 16 States that this fund should be distributed among the States strictly according to the compact between the States as expressed in the original act.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman is aware, no doubt, that section 9 of the original act from which he read a few moments ago was repealed by the reclamation bonding act of 1910, and that it is not now a part of the law.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am aware of this fact. But in my opinion its repeal is no credit to the Representatives from those States which have secured the larger part of the reclamation fund. When the provision to repeal section 9 was before the House, I offered an amendment to strike that provision out. I appealed to the House not to repeal that section. But my efforts were unsuccessful. To my surprise the gentlemen representing the great Northwestern and Southwestern States, the States where the reclamation fund has been largely expended, did not come to my relief. Certainly the gentleman whose State has received more than its share of this fund will not claim that it is any credit to his people that the original compact for the use and distribution of this fund has been violated.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think that the Federal Government ought to construct reclamation projects whether conditions exist which make them feasible or not, but simply for the purpose of expending some money in some one's district or State?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the provision to which he refers—of equalization—contained another provision under which no project could be undertaken unless a project was determined to be a feasible one. He knows that, does he not?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I understand that very well.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not the trouble with the gentleman's State that it has not advanced or brought forward or shown and in fact has no feasible irrigation project?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I knew that proposition would come up. The gentlemen representing the other States must have some excuse for preventing Oklahoma from having its share of this fund, and that is one of the excuses they now make, that Oklahoma has no practicable or feasible project; but I ask the gentleman—and the gentleman remembers my effort to prevent the repeal of section 9—if there were no feasible project in Oklahoma, then no money could be spent there; and then what could have been the harm in allowing section 9 to remain in that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Briefly.

Mr. MONDELL. I was not one of those who favored or was anxious to have that modification made. That was insisted upon in order that we might secure the advance of $20,000,000 from the Treasury. But the gentleman from Oklahoma knows, I think he should know, that had the law remained exactly as it was, had there been no change, Oklahoma would not have secured any project, because she has no feasible location for a project, and the modification of the statute could not change the situation so far as Oklahoma was concerned.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The gentleman is greatly mistaken when he states that there are no feasible irrigation projects in Oklahoma. The reports of the Reclamation Service show to the contrary. But the department has doubted the propriety of undertaking these projects up to the present time. But we have the feasible projects.

I will admit that up to the present time it has been immaterial as to the repeal of section 9. And why? Because prior to that time the fund had been appropriated and plans had been made to use all this fund in Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Idaho, and other States; and the repeal of section 9 does not prevent the construction of irrigation works in Oklahoma no more than it prevents the construction of irrigation works in any other State. Mr. Chairman, when I first came to Washington as a Representative the one thing I wished most to accomplish was to secure for Oklahoma some part of that great reclamation fund, and I went to the department soon after I came here. I saw the Secretary of the Interior; I saw the Director of the Reclamation Service, and I made my appeal for something for Oklahoma; but while I was courteously treated, yet I was told that there were no funds; that the funds were needed to complete works which had been already begun. And then I was told it would be necessary to issue $20,000,000 in bonds in order to increase this fund so we could partially complete projects already begun in the other States. And then came the bond proposition. I went before the Ways and Means Committee, that had jurisdiction of the bill to issue $20,000,000 in irrigation bonds. The gentleman from Wyoming remembers. I opposed the repeal of section 9, and when the bill was brought in the House I opposed the repeal. The law should have been allowed to stand as originally enacted. Now, every act of Congress has its history. So has the reclamation act. I have read the proceedings of the Fifty-seventh Congress, which passed this bill. The gentleman from Wyoming was a Member of the House at that time; and no doubt for the good of his State, as well as for the good of the country at large, he has been returned to this House and is here to-day. In a speech made by Mr. MONDELL, as shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 12, 1902, he said:

> At the beginning of the present session of Congress the Representatives from the 16 States and Territories embraced within the arid and semiarid portion of our country, believing that the time was ripe to present to the Congress a comprehensive plan of national undertaking of irrigation enterprise, formed a committee of 17 members, composed of Representatives and Senators from the region referred to, and this committee set about the formulation of a measure for the consideration of Congress. Most careful consideration was given to every detail of the proposed legislation, and after much discussion the measure was formulated and introduced in either House. Criticisms and suggestions were made relative to it, and as to the effect or intent of certain of its provisions, and after further thought and discussion the measure was finally amended in a way satisfactory, it is believed, to all of those favorable to national irrigation legislation and presented for your consideration.

Now, in the report of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, also made by the gentleman from Wyoming, upon this bill it is stated:

> Section 9 is intended to insure an uniform and harmonious development throughout the entire arid and semiarid region.

So that the object and purpose of section 9 was to secure, as the report says, written by the gentleman from Wyoming, "an uniform and harmonious development throughout the arid and semiarid region," and yet the fund has been so diverted that Oklahoma has been left entirely out in this "splendid, uniform, harmonious development" which the report describes. It may have been harmonious, but not uniform.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Just for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows, notwithstanding the repeal of section 9, a project might at any time be undertaken in Oklahoma when funds are available, if a practical project can be found.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, I am aware of that. That is the one hope we have.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the gentleman is fair to himself when he seems to convey the impression that he allowed Congress to shut that State out, because nothing of the kind was done.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I can not yield any further. It is true, under section 1, these funds are still to be used to irrigate lands in the States from which the funds came, so that the Secretary still has the power to use these funds in Oklahoma; and I still believe that somewhere along the line Oklahoma will get something out of this great fund. I shall not give up hope as long as I remain in this House that some time, somewhere, the gentlemen from Wyoming, Nebraska, and Washington, and those other great Western States will come to aid and assist me in securing justice for Oklahoma. I shall not cease while I shall remain a Member of this House to work for justice to my constituents and my State. We are entitled to our share of the benefits of this act. In time I have faith we will get our dues.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me again?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not mean by that that he desires us to aid him in securing money for a project that is not feasible——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. And that could not be successfully carried out?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No, sir; neither——

Mr. MONDELL. Whenever his State presents a feasible project——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma (continuing). Neither myself nor a single homesteader in Oklahoma would divert a single penny of this sacred fund to be wasted upon an impracticable project. Now, gentlemen make a splendid appeal here in behalf of the homesteaders on reclamation projects, and that comes very near to my heart, because I represent homesteaders largely. I have been among homesteaders in the West for 20 years. I think I know as much about homesteaders and their wants and have as high appreciation of the services they have rendered to the Nation as any man on the floor of this House, and yet I must look first to the homesteaders of my own district and my own State. I must see that their interests are not put in jeopardy.

And think about it, will you? You may take four or five of the northwestern counties of the State of Oklahoma—Woodward, Harper, Beaver, Texas, and Cimarron—extending out and including what was formerly "No Man's Land," a strip 35 miles wide and 170 miles long, extending 50 miles out beyond the western line of the State of Kansas, and a large portion of these homesteaders who went there, did so believing that under this splendid reclamation fund which Congress had created by the act of June 17, 1902, those lands would be made more valuable and productive, by reason of great irrigation works in that section of the State. I say they have been struggling throughout the last 6, 8, 10, or 12 years contending against the difficulties and obstacles and enduring hardships, and it was these men who contributed this $6,000,000, largely, to this fund. How did they get the $6,000,000? The greater part of them mortgaged their lands to secure it, paying from 8 to 24 per cent interest. So this $6,000,000 came through the hands of the homesteaders of Oklahoma. Their farms were mortgaged to contribute that amount to this fund, and yet you come here with a bill and ask me to vote to give your homesteaders 20 years' time, when by so doing you may still further defer the time when an important irrigation work will be constructed in Oklahoma.

Now, what have we accomplished? Twelve years have passed since the reclamation act became a law. Have we succeeded? Have we accomplished what we expected to accomplish? Have we made no serious mistakes? I think no one will so assert. I find by reading the speeches and reports upon this bill that when it was first passed that it was predicted and estimated that under this fund, in the course of 30 or 40 years, we would reclaim perhaps from 20,000,000 to 60,000,000 acres of land; that upon these lands we would locate and provide homes for probably 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 people. That was the picture that was drawn. But what have we done in 10 or 12 years? We have expended $106,000,000 and made homes for 11,000 homesteaders and occupants of land.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman wants to be entirely correct. We have expended only $80,000,000, and we have made homes for approximately 60,000 people.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have the same tables that were furnished to the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield a little further on that same proposition?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Not only have we made homes for those families that are on the reclamation projects, but for innumerable people that have come in, and who run stores and work in stores, and in little factories that supply lumber and supply material and other things in the communities that have been peopled by those who live on the reclamation projects.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. As I understand from the tables, $81,000,000 has come from proceeds of the land. Twenty million dollars has come from the bond issue, and then about $5,000,000 has come back from the payments that have been made on these lands, making about $106,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. But only $80,000,000 has been spent.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. It has not quite all been expended. This $20,000,000 will go in a very few years. It has been appropriated and set apart for specific projects. And we have from this $106,000,000, as I say, provided homes for 11,000 families, a population of 40,000 or 50,000 possibly. We have brought under irrigation only 1,250,000 acres of land. Texas County, Okla., which I represent, has 1,300,000 acres of land. Think about pouring into one county $106,000,000!

Mr. Chairman, I doubt the propriety of extending the period for the payment of the cost of construction of irrigation works from 10 to 20 years. By so doing I think you will lessen the productive power of the reclamation fund, that it will reduce the ability of the fund to reclaim desert lands. The fact that owners of land must pay from $40 to $100 per acre to cover the cost of constructing the works makes it necessary to give the settlers and owners of the land reasonable time, and in view of the fact that the cost per acre has been much larger than was at first expected, gives a good ground for a reasonable extension, and to that I shall not object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. McCOY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 8660. An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii," approved August 1, 1912.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1784) restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and tributaries, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 5957. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Sabine River in the States of Louisiana and Texas, about 2 miles west of Hunter, La.; and

S. 485. An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

EXTENSION OF PAYMENT UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, if this bill is open for amendment I offer the following amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Have we adopted the committee amendments, all of them?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 16, by inserting after the word "established," the following: "In addition to the principal of the construction charge there shall be paid in each case annual interest upon the balance of the construction charge remaining unpaid at the rate of 3 per cent per annum."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to what has been so ably stated by different gentlemen on this subject while the bill was under general debate. But it strikes me that to let these people have this tremendous amount of money without interest is absolutely indefensible. I am unable to conjure up in my mind any ground whatever that would justify this enormous appropriation year in and year out to the people engaged in farming on these reclamation projects without paying interest to the Government for the money put into them.

It has been demonstrated—at least to my mind conclusively—that the whole business is a failure, that it never has yielded back and never will, at least for a century to come, to the Government 100 cents on a dollar invested.

Now, to our friends on this side of the House I wish to say that we have inveighed year in and year out against special privilege If this is not special-privilege legislation, I never saw it in my life. Ever since the year 1864, down to the year 1912——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-two gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee accordingly rose: and Mr. COLLIER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called, whereupon 230 Members answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a request for a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. That is not in order now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order now. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 4628.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be reported again, as several Members have come in who have not heard it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COX:

Page 2, line 16, amend by inserting after the word "established" the following: "In addition to the principal of the construction charge there shall be paid in each case annual interest upon the balance of the construction charge remaining unpaid at the rate of 3 per cent per annum."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered is a very simple one, and needs no explanation from me. As an economic proposition, I believe it is clearly right. I can not see the wisdom, justice, or equity of piling into these projects millions upon millions of dollars each year for the benefit of a few people in the United States.

I have no objection whatever to the attempt to reclaim this land and to utilize it, and thereby add to the wealth of the Nation; but I do object to piling this money into these projects at the expense of the people, when but a very few of them will enjoy the benefits of it. In my judgment, it is unconscionable, unjust, inequitable, and absolutely unfair to tax the people of each and every congressional district to float a proposition at the expense of the many for the benefit of the few. I can not bring myself to a justification of it. An argument of tremendous force was made here the other day on this subject by the gentleman from Illinois. I tried to obtain an answer from some one who was defending and favoring the proposition, but they never answered me. If you propose to appropriate millions of dollars, without interest, for this purpose, why is not every congressional district represented upon the floor of this House entitled, on the same principle, to an equivalent amount of money to reclaim some land in that district? In my own county there is not less than 50,000 acres of wet land, as good land as the Lord ever created out of doors. The people there would give the Government all kinds of bonds for this money if they could only get it to reclaim that land without interest.

Mr. MADDEN. And they would be willing to pay some interest, too.

Mr. COX. Yes; and as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, they would be willing to pay a reasonable amount of interest to get it. Hence, as I said a moment ago, it can not be defended upon any economic ground, or any ground of justice and equality before the law.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield for a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman seems to assume that this only benefits the congressional district in which a project may be located. Now, is it not true that the reclamation laws are available to all of the people of the country, some of whom are represented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]?

Mr. COX. But only a small number of people can avail themselves of it. It was argued here the other day that interest ought not to be charged, because when this project was begun in 1902 the law did not provide for the payment of interest. That is no reason why we ought not to amend the law. If we have tried out the law and found it to be a failure, or have found that it is working an injustice to the people, it is our duty and it is up to us to amend it so as to make it a law of equality.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, this section to which the gentleman's amendment is offered applies only to those who hereafter enter upon the reclaimed land.

Mr. COX. That is true.

Mr. MANN. It does not apply to anyone who has heretofore entered?

Mr. COX. That is the proposition.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Does it not apply to anyone who applies for the benefit——

Mr. COX. Hereafter.

Mr. FALCONER. Hereafter, but under the enterprises already started and where the money has been expended for ditches?

Mr. COX. I think not.

Mr. FALCONER. Does it not, as a matter of fact?

Mr. COX. But I would go back and amend the law. I would make it apply to every one of these projects that was begun in 1902 or at any time prior to the passage of this law.

But to repeat, Mr. Chairman, if this is to be encouraged solely upon the ground that the law, when it was originally passed, did not provide for an interest charge, and if it is found that interest ought to be charged upon these payments, it is our duty to amend the law. It is special legislation, pure and simple. Why, ever since 1864, national banks which were made Government depositories have had the use every year of countless millions of dollars of the people's money, and it was not until 1912 that they were required to pay interest upon those deposits, and the Treasury Department has figured out that at 2 per cent interest on daily balances that would have yielded upward of $80,000,000 to the revenues of this country. And during the period of time the Government charged 2 per cent interest on daily deposits it yielded nearly $2,000,000 annually to the Government. This is a loan, pure and simple, to the farmers living on these projects, and why not make them pay a small rate on money advanced to them by the Government?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the committee to allow me to speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I had the pleasure and the honor of serving on the Irrigation Committee of this House when the original irrigation bill was written, and since that time I have taken some interest in this class of legislation.

I would like to see this great work succeed. I think there were some defects in the original bill, which perhaps should be amended; but I do not concur at all in the argument that has just been made by the gentleman from Indiana. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, whom are we asking to pay this interest? Are they the great corporations of this country? Is it the wealth of this country? Is it well-to-do people? No; we are asking a lot of people who have been unable to buy a home for themselves up to this time, who are invited to the West for a free home, many of whom have been living in sand and dirt for years, without schools, without water, without houses in which to take care of themselves and their families, and battling on this naked desert for a living [applause], in order that some day they may have what God should give to every man on this earth—a home for himself and family. [Applause.] I would like to ask the Members of this House who do not live in the arid West, when you appropriate and spend $50,000,000 a year for rivers and harbors, does everybody in this country and in every congressional district get a part of that money? No. Do you ask the people who are benefited to pay interest on that money which you appropriate to make rivers and harbors navigable? No. Do you ask them to return the principal? No.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I decline to yield now. You do not require the money you spend for river and harbor service to be returned. You maintain a row of locks and canals from Pittsburgh down the Ohio River at the expense of my constituency and at the expense of your constituency who never use the Ohio River for navigation, and yet you give them the principal without interest.

This money does not come from the Public Treasury raised by taxation. It is a part of the private purse of the Nation. It has been so construed since the beginning of this Government. It is not subject to the same constitutional limitation on expenditures that has been recognized as Government money that goes into the Treasury by taxation.

What have you done with the money from the public domain in years past? You gave it away. In the early history of the country you gave away the public domain for homes. Is that what you are doing now—giving it away for homes? No: you are only lending the public domain to the homestead settler to make him pay for water on the arid desert. [Applause.] And you ask that these people should be charged interest. You gave the public domain to the great railroads of this country. Did you ask them to return the principal or interest? No.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this contract was entered into with these people many years ago. Instead of saying we give to so many people of the United States so many free homesteads, we said we give to the Secretary of the Treasury as trustee the public domain in 18 arid-land States that he may assemble that money and use it for the purpose of making grass grow where no grass could grow before, to build homes where homes could not be built before, and then open it to homestead settlement. As a matter of fact, what is the difference in the proposition between opening the great plains of Ohio and Indiana and Illinois and giving homes to your fathers or taking a part of the public domain and expending it in a way so that you may give homes to your children? [Applause.]

I think this bill should be amended. I intend to support some of the amendments; but I say, Mr. Chairman, that when we gave the public domain to the great railroads of this country, gave them to the schools of the East, I am not prepared to agree that when there is a band of ragged, homeless, poor settlers fighting for their homesteads on the desert domain we should play the part of Shylock and ask for the pound of flesh. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] is recognized.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, before discussing the amendment I am impelled to express my appreciation, which is very hearty, indeed, of the able and eloquent remarks made by the justly distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the worthy floor leader of the majority, in opposition to interest charge. I congratulate the gentleman from Alabama on his very comprehensive grasp of the question and his correct conceptions of conditions in the semiarid West with which water users have to contend. I personally appreciate, and am sure the home builders of the semiarid West will highly appreciate, his effort made in behalf of their just cause.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment requiring the payment of interest. It is thoroughly repugnant to the spirit of the original reclamation act. Its enactment, in my judgment, would constitute a breach of faith with the people of the great semiarid West. But I now wish to express my views only as to the economic or business side of the question. I regard it as a saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung. Perhaps I have forgotten the language of the old fireside expression, but I remember the wisdom it contains.

To explain my meaning, there would be a loss to the public many times as much by deferring the development of semiarid lands as there would be gained by the Government in interest. There would be many times as much lost in the way of agricultural production by the delay of 5 or 10 years in opening up the lands to cultivation as the Government would gain in interest.

Mr. Chairman, to be better understood, the more money that is to be paid the longer it will take water users to make it out of the lands, and in proportion to the amount of interest required to be paid it would be necessary to extend the time limit beyond 20 years in which to make full payment of interest and principal. I understand the advocates of interest charge grant this proposition and would willingly extend the time limit of payment 10 years or more in addition to the 20 years' limit provided by the bill if their demand for interest payment be yielded. But as the amendment provides that interest be paid annually we will assume that but five years' delay would be caused in the development of 3,000,000 more acres, assuming that new entries would continue as if there were no interest charge, but which I do not think would prove true. I regard it as a fair estimate that the gross production per acre of these lands under a good system of irrigation would average at least $50 an acre. The gross production then of 3,000,000 acres would amount to $150,000,000 per year. For five years the gross production would amount to $750,000,000. The farmer water user ought to secure a net return out of this gross production of, say, $20 per acre per year, which would amount to $60,000,000 for 3,000,000 acres. For five years it would amount to $300,000,000. I should have stated the cost of construction, and therefore water-right charge, on 3,000,000 acres at $50 per acre amounts to $150,000,000. Interest at the rate of 3 per cent for one year upon $150,000,000 amounts to $4,500,000. For five years it would amount to $22,500,000.

Mr. Chairman, this shows that while the Government would be gaining $22,500,000 in interest, the semiarid West would lose at the same time in production $750,000,000. As our agricultural production is now about equaled by our home consumption, it is fair to assume that $750,000,000 worth of farm products raised in the semiarid West might save the necessity of the importation from foreign countries of an equal amount of farm products. But, Mr. Chairman, what would become meanwhile of existing water users? As a matter of course, most of them would fail. Not only this, the operation of the reclamation law would fail for the want of new entrymen for new projects and for new units on existing projects. As I have heretofore argued, the undertaking of water users will not endure an interest charge. It would be too much like doing business on a watered-stock basis. Unless they can commence and get started on a basis that will permit of their making a living, securing reasonable returns for their labor, they must sooner or later fail in the entries they make.

Mr. Chairman, I propose now to demonstrate by a correct mathematical calculation I have made how this interest amendment would operate in a concrete case like the North Platte project, where the average amount of the water-right charge remaining unpaid is a little over $50 per acre. Why, for the first few years interest payments would exceed the amount of the principal required to be paid by this bill. On this project, as the bill provides, the average payment of principal for the first year would be $83.02, while the interest payment would be $124.53, thus exceeding the principal payment by $41.51. And yet this is a relief bill. For the second year, as the bill provides, the principal payment would be $83.02 and the interest payment $122.04.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman talked for three-quarters of an hour the other day, and I think he is imposing upon this side of the House. I shall have to object.

Mr. MANN. Oh, he is the ranking Republican on the committee.

Mr. DONOVAN. He talked for three-quarters of an hour the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, continuing with my estimate, for the third year the bill requires the payment of $83.02 principal, while the interest amendment would require the payment of $119.54. The fourth year the principal required to be paid by the bill would amount to $83.02, while the interest amendment offered would require the payment of $117.06. The fifth year the principal required to be paid by the bill would amount to $166.04, while the interest amendment offered would require the payment of $114.56.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the written estimate I hold, showing how the act would operate with the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] requiring the payment of interest at 3 per cent.

But, Mr. Chairman, the result of the operation of the act with the interest amendment adopted would be to require the water user on such a project as the North Platte project to pay $18.66 per acre more for his water right than without interest payment. Interest payment on an 80-acre unit in the North Platte project at 3 per cent would amount to $1,491.68. Is this the way to afford relief when it is so greatly needed? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, what is the question before us? It is a question now of whether we are going to establish irrigation projects or reclaim lands on a business basis, or whether we are going to reclaim the lands and hand them over to settlers without any relation to what the business of the situation is. In 1902 we began this work. In 1903 we had expended $268,000; in 1904 we had expended $1,781,000; in 1905, $5,548,100; in 1906, $12,632,900; in 1907, $25,008,800; in 1908, $36,253,200; in 1909, $45,757,900; in 1910, $53,781,300; in 1911, $60,940,800; in 1912, $69,858,200; in 1913, $76,233,000; and in 1914, $83,588,200. The interest which would have accrued on that amount of money, if we charged at the rate of 3 per cent, up to the 30th of June, 1914, would have been $14,150,664. And all the money that has been paid in by the settlers up to the present time is less than one-third of what the accrued interest on the sum that has been expended would amount to.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I refuse to yield. What are we doing? We are developing arid lands. We are endeavoring to make them settleable for the people who want homes in the West. We are investing at the rate of $60 an acre for the development of the water that may be turned onto these lands so as to make them cultivable. We are investing in the 3,000,000 acres of land proposed to be developed under the law now in existence about $200,000,000. We are paying this money from the sale of public lands all over the Union, and we are turning that money into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, carte blanche, to expend as he pleases.

When we have these $200,000,000 we are giving the land that is developed by that expenditure to the people who want to settle there. How much do we charge them for the land? Not a cent. Is it fair to assume that when we give this land to these people to settle there, free, after the expenditure of $200,000,000, there ought not to be any interest charged? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the distinguished leader of the Democratic side of the House, said that we do not charge interest to the people who get the benefits from developments of rivers and harbors. Of course we do not. There is no comparison between the two propositions. Who owns the rivers and harbors after the money is expended on the development? The people of the United States. Who owns the land that these people settle on after we have expended our $200,000,000 for their settlement? The people that settle on the land, and nobody else. The man who owns 160 acres of land there is the sole beneficiary. The gentleman from Alabama says we do not charge the people interest on the money invested in the Life-Saving Service for lighthouses. Who owns the lighthouses? Who controls them? Who has a title to them? Does any individual in the United States own them or have title to them? Not at all. Why should anybody pay interest on the investment? Who owns the land all over the United States? The men who toil on the farms. Who loans them money without interest? Nobody. Is there land anywhere in the United States that needs development or reclaiming? Yes; there are millions of acres down on the Mississippi River. There is just as much reason for saying that we ought to reclaim the lands on the Mississippi River, where we have an alluvial soil, so rich that there is not anything like it in all the world, as there is for reclaiming land elsewhere. Why not reclaim that? Why not give the people of Mississippi and all the border States along the Mississippi Valley the benefit of the expenditure of this money for reclamation, where the land when reclaimed is worth something and where crops can be raised, regardless of whether waterways are built through which the water can flow upon the land? I see no reason on earth why this money should be expended by the Government of the United States without the payment of interest by those who receive the benefit. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID], the lightning calculator at mathematics, made the statement a moment ago that $18.62 would be added to the price per acre of the land by the payment of the interest.

And I will say to the gentleman that the price of land is only $60 for development, and only $1.80 would be the amount of interest to be paid on the cost of an acre of land, so that I do not see where the gentleman gets $18.60. The gentleman adds to that ten times——

Mr. FALCONER. That is for one year.

Mr. MADDEN. It is only $1.80, or 3 per cent interest on $60——

Mr. FALCONER. Per year.

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to give all the time extension these people out there want for the payment of the cost of the development of this land, whether it is 20 years, 25 years, 30 years, 35 years, or 40 years, but they ought to be obliged to pay interest on the money expended by the Government for the development of the land. We have lots of lands in Illinois that can be developed, and we would be glad to have the Government of the United States furnish the money to develop them, and we would be glad to pay the United States Government interest on the money which it would loan us for that purpose. The people in the other States of the Union have lands that can be developed. Why not use part of this reclamation fund for their benefit? Why not use part of the reclamation fund that is being expended in such vast quantities for the development of lands where people are willing and able to pay interest? If the people of this section of the country are not able to pay interest on money advanced by the United States, the projects are not worth developing. If we are not able, after we have expended $200,000,000 out of the Public Treasury, to assure ourselves that the land is worth settling upon, then we are not representing the American people with that degree of intelligence which they expected of us when they sent us here. It is our duty, we are obligated by our oath, to see that no dollar of the public money is expended extravagantly or unwisely or unjustly. We are obligated by our oath of office to see that every transaction performed by the Congress of the United States is so performed that it will stand the light of criticism, and I submit to you men here to-day that the expenditure of these $200,000,000 for the development of these arid lands without the payment of interest by the men who now contemplate further development is not only unjust but indefensible.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I desire very briefly to express some thoughts which occurred to me while the gentleman who has just taken his seat was speaking. This is not a proposition to start anew this irrigation project and let the people pay the principal back, and, in addition to that, require them to pay interest. It is a project that was started many years ago. In its wisdom that earlier Congress considered this a great national enterprise and not merely for the local benefit of a few, and provided, what was at that time an unheard-of proposition, that the people who settled on these lands under these reclamation projects should pay the principal back in 10 years. The Government engineers mistook the time they could finish the work. The people who went on the lands, seeking and hungry for homes, were misled partly by these Government engineers and by their own hopefulness that they would get a home, and so undertook it. It is ascertained that unless the relief is given they will have to give up the enterprise almost in a body. Now and then you will find people who will survive, but the proposition before you to-day, nakedly stated, is this: Whether you will throw away that $83,000,000 that the gentleman has added up here before you and abandon this enterprise, that has been on foot in this country for years, as an absolute failure, or whether you will give these poor settlers—and I know personally many of them are hungry, not merely for homes and for land, but hungry for the necessities of life for their wives and children—this opportunty to procure a home; and here we are met by gentlemen like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] and others on the floor of the House by the proposition, "You must starve or quit the proposition," a proposition as to which the Government made as much of a mistake as these people have made. Gentlemen on this floor say these settlers may starve or quit the proposition, and we will accept the loss of $83,000,000 and abandon the enterprise. Mr. Chairman, in a nutshell, that is what is to be decided now, namely, shall the Government lose the millions already invested by placing the additional burden of an interest charge on the settler and thus forcing him to give up and abandon his claim? [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that these settlers should be required to pay interest upon the money invested in this land. The Government is going to expend about $60 an acre in placing water upon it. It was originally estimated that about $30,000,000 would be realized from the sale of public lands in the arid and semiarid States, but from 1901 to 1913 $80,901,000 was realized. It was all expended, and the $20,000,000 authorized to be obtained by the issuance of certificates of indebtedness has also been expended, and it is estimated that it will take $100,000,000 additional to complete the works now in progress. The subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations made an investigation this winter of the Reclamation Service. They prepared a synopsis of the testimony taken before that committee, and in the synopsis, signed by Mr. BORLAND, of Missouri, Mr. WHITE, of Ohio, Mr. CARR, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. MAHAN, of Connecticut, the statement is made "that the evidence indicates that a greater percentage of the land under irrigation projects is still in the hands of speculators, only the smaller fractions being in the possession of actual settlers." What will this House be confronted with in a very short time? Legislation to provide a system of rural credits. All over this country in the rural sections there is a demand that some system be devised by the Federal Government by which the farmer can more readily borrow money in order to finance the operations of his farm. If Congress determines to expend over $200,000,000 in making lands in the arid and semiarid regions available for cultivation, donating them merely upon the reimbursement to the Federal Government over a period of 15 years of the principal without interest, what defense can there be to the proposition that a system be devised whereby the lowly owner of some farm property at some place in the country, who might profitably till his farm and sustain himself in decency if he had $5,000 or $10,000 worth of improvements upon it, be financed by the Federal Government to make those improvements with a requirement that opportunity be given to repay the principal in 15 or 20 years without interest?

What answer can be made to the farming community of this country if we are to make tillable and possible of cultivation Government lands and give them to the men seeking them merely upon a return of the investment necessary to make them profitable over a period of 15 years, when the man who has the land himself asks that the Federal Government advance him for 15 years or 10 years or 5 years enough money to make it possible for him to put his farm in shape, so that he can make profitable returns from it and not be compelled to pay interest upon the investment required?

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this is one of the gravest questions the House has been compelled to confront in a long time. There will be rural-credit legislation after a very brief period. There is a universal sentiment in this country for it. It will be necessary to exercise the utmost care and take the greatest precautions to evolve a system that will be fair to those seeking extensions of credit along such lines without doing an injustice to the rest of the people or without launching the Government upon a scheme of financial operations that may well tax to the limit the energies and the resources of the people to maintain. And yet, if we establish this precedent and invest the money taken from the Treasury, advance it to some one who takes these Government lands, letting them take a period of 15 years to return it without interest, we can never meet the demands that will be irresistibly made upon us.

This situation is not similar to the situations that have been referred to. The business, the great function of the Federal Government is to maintain aids to navigation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York ask unanimous consent for three minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all I want.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A function of the Federal Government is to maintain a lighthouse service as an essential aid to the safe navigation of the navigable waters over which the Government has control. A function of the Federal Government is to improve the navigable waters so that they may be safely navigated and so as to provide competitive rates and facilities with the great transportation systems of the country in order that those who have products to ship, as well as those who desire to purchase them, will not have imposed upon them burdens for transportation beyond all reason. The Life-Saving Service is somewhat similar. It might as well be said that the people of the seaboard should be compelled in some way to pay interest on the money expended to maintain a navy, because in no possible way from one standpoint does the interior of the country benefit from it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have only three minutes.

Or it might be said that a city, a great commercial center on the seaboard, should be compelled to pay interest on the amount expended for the coast defenses, because that particular place is defended and some point in the interior is not.

But those situations are not at all analogous to this one. Here is Government land, with persons taking it up for settlement under the law, the Government advancing the money to finance the improvement and development of the same. All that is asked is that there shall be returned principal and interest. I am not particular about the rate of interest, whether it be 3 per cent or 2 per cent. But let us establish as a policy of the Government that it will advance without interest the money necessary to finance those operations essential to make possible the development of lands taken from the Government, and there can not be any answer to the demand that every farmer in the United States owning his own land shall have advanced to him out of the Federal Treasury such sum as might properly be loaned upon his property for a term of years for the development of that land, to be returned after a period of years without any interest. If we launch into this policy now, we can not avoid the other, and as good, sound business men we should not do so.

Two hundred million dollars is projected in these schemes. Is it not enough that the resources of the country should be taxed to such an extent so as to enable men to settle upon and take up these lands, without asking the Federal Treasury to bear the burden of sustaining them? Mr. Chairman, it is said that this money is not taken out of the Treasury. We own a great public domain, an asset of the Federal Government, and it is provided by law that the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the arid and semiarid States shall be put into this reclamation fund and spent for the improvement and development of the land in the arid and semiarid States. Can it be said that is not taken out of the Treasury? If it had not been for that law, the money would have been turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and counted in the grand total necessary to provide the money to pay the expenses of the Government. To the extent of $80,000,000 the general funds of the Treasury have been depleted because the proceeds of these sales have been turned into the reclamation fund. We have borrowed $138,000,000 to help defray the cost of the building of the Panama Canal, paying interest on $84,000,000 at 2 per cent and fifty and odd million dollars at 3 per cent. If this money had not been diverted from the general funds of the Treasury and segregated in this reclamation fund, the country would not to-day be paying interest on $80,000,000 of the bonds issued for that purpose. It surely is a charge upon the Federal Treasury. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to these amendments and opposed to the payment of any interest on the deferred payments. I would like to call this matter to the attention of the House in a little different way than it has been presented relative to the question of interest. I trust that the Members from the Middle West, and the East, and the South will not be driven off their feet upon the question that the farmer is ready and willing to pay a reasonable interest upon a loan on his land in order that he may develop it. These men in the East in former generations were given this land like those who are struggling in the West. The present generation and the generation before have inherited this, with good homes, good roads, good towns, and you can now well afford to go into improving the country in which you live.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield just now.

In the Middle West you have turned over a greater part of this domain to the railroad companies, and they took the best there was. I want to impress upon the mind of every man from the South and the East that for the last 40 years this Government, in its wisdom, has had upon the statute books laws that have given to these men free land and free water. A man living in the West knows what that means. He has taken his homestead, he has taken his desert land, and he gets his water without any cost to him. For 40 years of this selecting of the public domain it has taken the water without any expense. We find great empires of land that is not susceptible of use, not susceptible of men living upon it, without irrigation. This Congress in its wisdom, some eight years ago, believed that we should go, not to the Public Treasury, that we should not tax any man a dollar, but to the public-domain States and take the funds received from the sale of that land and turn them over to the Government that they might build it up, that they might put the remaining public domain in the position in which the greater part had been placed, namely, with good land and water.

And you find the people in that condition now, where, by virtue of the Government's energy, by virtue of the knowledge, by virtue of the brains and ability that this Government has gathered together in the Reclamation Service, hundreds of thousands of acres of the public domain have been reclaimed by private individuals, and that fund has been put into the fund of the Reclamation Service, that otherwise would not be there to-day. By virtue of the same energy and work, the Carey Act and the other acts have been put forward, and thousands of dollars have been put into the reclamation fund and into the Treasury for the reclamation fund, for the purpose of continuing to build up these tracts of land that were absolutely worthless and upon which human nature could not exist.

Now, after you have started these men on the road for eight years and have held out the hopes to them that they might be treated like those in the East, that they might have water brought to their land, that a larger fund might be placed in the Treasury of the United States, that the Government might receive its price from the land, and that all the other lands might be sold and this land used for the purpose of developing and enhancing the remaining public land, after you have given this attention and started it, you say you want to place this interest upon this investment, when the Government is trying to put it in the same shape as the rest of the land that it has given away.

In practically all the projects, by virtue of the high cost of material and the high cost of everything, by additions to the projects, they have doubled and quadrupled in cost, not by any fault of the men on the ground, but because of necessity. You said they should have 10 years' time in which to pay back this money. Is it anything more than right and fair that they should be given an extra time of 10 years more in which they could pay back to this Government the money? Unquestionably no.

Some one has intimated, some one has been unkind enough to say, that the Government will not get back this money. Anyone who has read the case of Shirley against Baker, the case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, knows that the maintenance fund and the upkeep fund has all been or will be paid back by these farmers.

The entire amounts that go into this fund are to return to the United States, and as a result after 10 years, as the law now stands, and under this bill 20 years, these men will pay back into the Treasury of the United States every dollar of money that has been expended, and the Government is not out one cent. You have the money in the Treasury instead of having barren wastes of land out there unused and unprovided for. Is there anybody injured? Can these men in the East and in the South—and I know there are only a few—say, "Why, my home was taken up as a homestead or preemption 50 years ago, and I wish you had loaned me money on my place to improve it and better it"? There is no comparison nor analogy between the cases at all, and it is only a question of treating these men in the proper shape, dealing with them as you would deal with an ordinary business man. There is not a business man in this House that does not know—and it is done every day—that when a man finds that he has his money invested and finds that his mortgagee can not possibly come out whole he not only reduces the principal in some instances, but in pretty nearly all of them he reduces the interest.

The Government has held out the hope to these people in the West. You have invited them there with this understanding, that they would pay no interest upon the money invested. All you have asked of them—and they have agreed to it—is that they will pay it back at stated times, as it is now in 10 equal installments of the money invested, first, the absolute amount of the construction of the dam, and, second, the money paid for the upkeep and maintenance of the entire project.

This bill, in addition to the first section—and I want to call your attention to it, so that there may be no misunderstanding—provides that each man that comes under the present projects must agree, or he can not get the benefit of the 20 years' time, that he will comply with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. This is a law that will make it better for the Government and make it better for the individual to have it in that way rather than as it is at the present time.

Why, we talk about the various projects that the Government has benefited. It has been fully explained and gone into as to the construction of harbors. You are ready and willing to improve them. You are ready and willing to improve the rivers, but you have a million acres of land with water at a long distance, and you have said now that by an expenditure of the money from these same lands and others of like character and lands from the Western States, "We will take that land, we will impound that water, and we will use it for the purpose of putting the land in shape so that it is habitable and that a man may use it." It is a benefit to the Government, and you have thus improved that million acres of land. You have placed 10,000 families upon that tract of land. You have enhanced the wealth of this country by ten or twenty million dollars, and by virtue of direct and indirect taxation you are benefiting the States and you are benefiting this Nation by doing it.

And now at this time can it be possible that this Congress would change its plan and its policy and say to these men, after their hardships and struggles, that more burden should be placed upon them? I think not. This House will not require this extra burden. There is enough now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, and Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent to proceed, but I believe there is an understanding that I shall have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see this country populated and colonized wherever there is available land. I believe it would be well if we could encourage a more general distribution of the people. In some large cities undoubtedly there are those who would be better off if they went into the country districts or even into the far West. But they ought not to go upon arid or semiarid lands if they are to make dead failures of their lives or to take upon themselves, without an adequate return, the very great hardships that have been referred to in this debate. Moreover, there ought to be no misrepresentation, either upon the part of the Government or upon the part of private speculators, to induce men to leave the East or any other section of the country to go upon arid or semiarid lands if they are to be made to suffer as has been stated here.

I would not oppose the extension of the time that has been allotted to those who in good faith have already taken up these arid lands and who are now waiting for irrigation and the development of the crops, through which they hope to make good their contract. I sympathize keenly with those who are thus embarrassed, more especially if their misfortune had been due to misrepresentation or false pretense upon the part of speculators.

SETTLERS MUST GO IN TO MAKE GOOD.

But we are now about to make a new contract, and I believe, in the light of experience, that the time has come to give notice to every man who in good faith intends to go upon this land hereafter that he goes in with his eyes open and must no longer expect to fall back upon the bounty of the Government; that he goes in with a definite understanding that at the expiration of the time of the contract he must make good; that if 10 years is the limit, that is the limit, and it is the end of the contract.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those who have already gone in may not have sought to go in as the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] insists. They may have gone in upon representations made to them that were misleading and unfair; but having gotten in, there may be no earthly way for them to get out except by extending their time. I repeat I sympathize with those who are already in, but that is no reason why others should be induced to go in with them.

NO DISCRIMINATION IN FAVOR OF EAST.

The gentleman from California seems to think the eastern farmer has been favored as against the farmer who staked his chances upon this irrigated land. He can not compare this situation with anything that has prevailed in the experience of the early eastern pioneer. Neither can the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], whose eloquence swayed the House a little while ago, because those men who carved out their homes on the farms and through the forests of the East had no such subsidy, no such governmental inducement, as has been made to the 11,000 farmers who have gone in under these irrigation schemes. While their lives may have been hard—and I am sure they were—the irrigation farmer had the advantage of Government aid, which the eastern farmer never had. They have been especially favored in this respect. No such expenditure for a like number of farmers has ever been made by the Government as has been made in support of these reclamation projects, and the eastern farmer, in particular, never had any such financial or paternalistic assistance.

MILLIONS TO BENEFIT A FEW.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I regret I can not, because my time is so limited. The best figures we have show that the farmers who have been induced, by circularizing or otherwise, to go out of the East onto the arid lands number 11,320. Give each of them a family of five and that makes 55,000 people who are the beneficiaries of this system, or the victims of it, either one or the other. That means about as many people in all of these 17 arid-land States as the number of residents in one ward in the city of Boston, or in the city of Philadelphia, or in the city of New York. Eleven thousand farmers means about as many farmers as there are in the district of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], or any other gentleman who represents a farming district not in arid or semiarid territory. And whether it be Government money or not, it is Government land we appropriate. Thus far we have spent for these 11,000 farmers $86,000,000. Make a mental or pencil calculation, and you will find that the inducement made to these pioneers who are carving their way through these arid lands and this sagebrush is approximately $7,500 per farm. I would like some gentleman from Indiana or some gentleman from Illinois or some gentleman from Ohio to rise and say whether any one of his pioneer farmers, whose record he now looks back to with pride as son and heir, ever had such assistance offered to him by the Government? Answer, you up in North Dakota; answer, you down in Texas, whether the Government ever started you in business with the dead-sure promise that it would spend $7,500 upon 40 acres of land.

Mr. FALCONER. Oh, no: $60 an acre.

Mr. MOORE. Forty acres of land is about the limit of the farm unit under an irrigation scheme, as shown by these tables.

A LONG WAIT FOR RESULTS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We sell land on 40 years' time at 4 and 5 per cent interest.

Mr. MOORE. My sympathies are with those men who have gone on these lands. I do not care whether they have come from foreign lands or not; if they have gone out there from the East I wish them Godspeed in what they are undertaking to do. I have seen some of them who have persisted there for three, four, and five years, and the testimony of the gentlemen who have spoken for them indicates that some of them have labored in this sagebrush territory, waiting for their trees to come to fruition and their crops to develop for six, seven, and eight years, living meanwhile on canned goods and at times without fresh vegetables. If these people have been taken in and wronged, we should not encourage others——

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman say they live on canned goods on a farm?

Mr. MOORE. I venture to say the gentleman will find enough tin cans on these remote farms of his State to roof every shack in the irrigated district.

Mr. BRYAN. Nobody lives on canned goods, without vegetables, on our farms.

Mr. MOORE. I do not accuse the gentleman himself of living on canned goods. The gentleman lives on the fat of the land.

Mr. BRYAN. The people out in my State have plenty of vegetables.

WATERWAY IMPROVEMENTS BRING REVENUE.

Mr. MOORE. I hope they have, but the gentleman is taking my time. Now, the East has been assailed in this debate because, like the West, the Middle West, and the South, it is striving to obtain improvements to its rivers and harbors. The East has been accused of robbing the Government in the matter of appropriations. Why, the eastern ports produce 80 per cent of all the revenue of this Government that comes in from the customhouses. It is entitled to river and harbor appropriations, because it has been sadly neglected. There is no justification, so far as it is concerned, for the holding up of the river and harbor bill in the filibuster that is now being conducted at the other end of this Capitol. The East has nothing to apologize for in its relations to the West. Go into Seattle, go into the gentleman's own town in Washington, and when the question is asked as to land values, even the boom values that prevail there, "Where does this money come from?" you will find that it comes out of the East. We have sent you money to build your railroads and put you on your feet, while we have suffered a lack of transportation facilities. And you have been legislating to get more of it.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to say that we are sending money to the East all the time.

Mr. MOORE. It would be very welcome in view of what your party has done to us.

Mr. BRYAN. You have got it.

Mr. MOORE. And I guess we pay for it. Under recent legislative conditions we will be glad to have all you send, if we can get anybody to take the risk of running our factories.

Mr. BRYAN. We have recently quit sending it to New York.

IMPROVED FARMS IN EAST AT SMALL COST.

Mr. MOORE. Some time ago, Mr. Chairman, the question of farm values was raised in this House, and there were some who expressed surprise when the statement was made that those who were going out on the arid plains and cleaning up sagebrush, which cost from $25 to $110 an acre to improve for irrigation, might do a little better and do it a little quicker if they looked down the Mississippi Valley and stayed there, or if they looked over the Atlantic coast and remained there. We have some pride in keeping our farmers at home. Nor is it fair that those who go West or anywhere else should be deceived as to what they are to get. The sagebrush farm may be very productive, but it takes seven or eight years for crops to come into bearing. Over along the Atlantic coast we can sell farms, irrigated by nature, with houses on them, for the price of constructing the irrigating and supply works in the arid region.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PERTINENT REVENUE FIGURES.

Mr. MOORE. In view of the attacks that have been made upon the East, and without desiring to be unfair or invidious, I insist that a comparison of the revenues raised in the various States for the support of the Union would leave very little ground for those who assail the East to stand upon. Such a comparison would prove conclusively in the matter of appropriations that the East is not only self-sacrificing but unfairly liberal to other sections of the country. Gentlemen have complained of river and harbor appropriations to eastern projects. These have been almost ludicrously low, in view of the returns that come back to the country through the rivers and harbors sought to be improved. New York, for instance, collects $225,000,000 of Federal revenue, while Pennsylvania contributes $46,000,000 and Massachusetts $35,000,000. New York State has paid as much for its own waterways, which benefit the entire country, as the Federal Government has spent upon all the ports and rivers of the Atlantic seaboard. Massachusetts and Pennsylvania have not received back from the Government in a hundred years as much as they turn into the Government every year. Maryland contributes to the Federal Government every year $13,000,000, while the Government has not given it more than $10,000,000 for rivers and harbors in 100 years. New Jersey contributes $10,000,000 every year to the Federal Government, and in return therefor has not received for rivers and harbors more than $7,000,000 in 100 years.

ATTACKS UPON EAST WITHOUT FOUNDATION.

I am in favor of colonizing and upbuilding the 17 arid and semiarid land States, but I am safe in saying that the internal revenue derived by the Government from all of them is not equal to that derived from Pennsylvania, nor is it much greater than that derived from the State of New Jersey alone. When our friends indulge in their attacks upon the East they ought to put these figures alongside of the $86,000,000 we have already spent to irrigate land for 11,000 farmers. And they should indulge us a little further when we venture the suggestion that there is still a vast quantity of improved and unimproved land in the Mississippi Valley and along the Atlantic seaboard that could be purchased at prices per acre far below the cost of installing irrigation plants in arid territory.

EAST FULL OF OPPORTUNITY.

Without reflecting upon the work of irrigation, nor upon the desirability of reclaiming arid and semiarid lands, I wish to quote from an address made by the Hon. Frank E. Howe, lieutenant governor of Vermont, made at the Jacksonville convention of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association in November, 1913. Speaking from personal knowledge of fertile lands in Florida and also in the State of Vermont, he said:

> Both are States of few cities. The great area of Vermont and the great area of Florida are made up of land which is only partially developed, land which is only giving a part of what it ought to produce. You have all heard about the abandoned farms of New England. Now, as a matter of fact, there are very few farms in New England that are absolutely deserted, but there are thousands and tens of thousands that produce only a fraction of what they ought to give, because of sloth and inefficient ownership.
> In Florida you have much the same condition, though you may call it by a different name. You have scratched the earth in a few garden spots like Lake Helen, Hastings, Fort Lauderdale, and Miami, of which we often hear, and in other places the names of which are not so familiar to us in the North; but all around these garden spots you have areas just as fertile, waiting for the hand of labor and business judgment to develop them and bring forth their increase.

Vermont is in precisely the same predicament. Vermont produces more corn per acre than Illinois, more wheat per acre than Minnesota, more apples per tree than Oregon, more butter per cow than Iowa, and yet Vermont farms go begging at from $15 to $25 an acre.

I have spoken of Vermont and Florida, but privately and confidentially I want to tell you that the same condition exists in every Eastern State. You have got your cities; you are proud of their progress. But in order to develop the country and make it progressive as a whole, and make it do what it ought to do, you have got to reach these back areas, these areas which are not doing what they ought to do in adding to the prosperity and progress of the United States. You may say that all this has no part in a waterways convention; but it has. You may say that the cattle grower from Kissimmee cares nothing about the Raritan Canal; you may say the toiler on the Hudson River or in the Connecticut Valley or the Merrimac Valley knows or cares nothing about the toiler on the James. Perhaps once he did not, but at this time he does, for the completion of this waterways system is of interest to every citizen of every State.

Every State is a partner of every other State in the progress of our country. The completion of this proposed Atlantic waterways system will not only save our people millions in transportation charges, it will add millions of wealth through the development of our fertile areas, it will increase by millions the value of our real estate, and it will save thousands of human lives now lost on our wind-swept and treacherous coasts.

EAST FURNISHED MEN AND MONEY TO THE WEST.

Now, there is no special reason for rejecting Horace Greeley's advice to "Go west." Every true American admires the pioneer who blazed the way through the trackless forests and over the unbeaten mountain paths to settle and develop the West. The western type of citizenship and the western genius for hustle in business and for appropriations in Congress excites our interest if not our admiration. But our western friends who have taken an aggressive part in this discussion have no good reason for chiding the East. The East is neither effete nor is it done as an agricultural community. While we have been giving away our western lands and every inducement has been made to the settler to go in upon them, the heaviest draft has been made upon the East. It has furnished the men and the money, and in doing so it has neglected many of its own opportunities, transportation facilities and waterways improvements being among them. But just as the lieutenant governor of Vermont has observed, it has overlooked its own farms, it has not made that bid for settlers that has characterized other sections of the country.

MANY FARMS NEAR THE LARGE CITIES.

People talk of congestion in the East. We have congestion in the large cities, but within 25 miles of most of them, along neglected rivers or otherwise close to the market, there are ample productive farms for any existing surplus population. Read the real estate advertisements in any of the metropolitan sheets and ample evidence is forthcoming of farm opportunities that challenge the per-acre prices that hold in the Middle West and that make amazing to the average eastern man the story of the pioneer who enters arid or semiarid territory to wait for years until his efforts shall bring forth any return whatever. If irrigation that requires so much time and patience costs for construction only from $25 to $110 per acre, what shall we say of improved farms awaiting the tiller near great cities as described in these sample advertisements?

Near West Chester, Pa.:

One hundred and seventy-five acres—A farm at a speculation price. Only $50 per acre. Main line P. R. R. Desirable stock, grain, and fruit farm; large stone dwelling; large stone barn; new wagon house; two springs, with spring houses; spring water by gravity; woodland; beautiful views.

In Montgomery County, Pa.:

Sixty acres, close to Norristown and Pottstown trolley, with stone house, eight rooms; good barn and outbuildings; plenty fruit and grain planted; close to best of markets; $50 per acre; $1,000 worth of cedar posts; terms.

In the Perkiomen Valley, Pa.:

Seventy-five acres, $2,800, only $1,200 cash, balance easy terms; large eight-room stone house, bank barn, necessary outbuildings; two fine springs, spring house; near creamery, stores, school, etc.; some crops included; all clean, tillable, machine-worked fields; immediate possession.

EASTERN FARM OPPORTUNITIES.

These are but a few advertisements from a Philadelphia paper of to-day, but I venture to say that from $25 to $50 per acre would buy improved land in sufficient quantities to accommodate all of the 11,000 farmers who are striving for success upon these western irrigation projects in any of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, or Virginia, or in either of the Carolinas. It is not generally known, but it ought to be, in the interests of the East as well as of the entire country, that nearly half of the tillable land of the thirteen original States is still available for the man who is seeking a home upon the farm.

Most of the manufactories of the country are in the Eastern States and in the old colonial area, but it is likewise true that some of the States east of the Appalachian chain have the greatest agricultural records in certain lines of production. The richest county in productivity in the United States is Lancaster, Pa. In buckwheat production Pennsylvania excels. It is not very far behind in dairy products. New York, Maine, and Pennsylvania rank one, two, three as potato raisers, while the duplicated crops of Florida are the marvel of the country.

That the East may not lose its status in agriculture, I call attention to a very remarkable statement in a carefully prepared address by the former Director of the Census, Mr. E. Dana Durand, at Richmond, in 1911:

MORE STRIKING FIGURES.

Mr. Durand showed that the total area of farm land in the 13 original States in 1910 was 161,000,000 acres. Of this vast acreage only 83,000,000 were improved up to 1910, leaving 78,000,000 available for the settler. The figures of the then Director of the Census have such an important bearing upon the question now under consideration that I quote a portion of them, as follows:

Although during the first 60 years of our national existence the 13 original States developed much more rapidly in manufactures and commerce than in agriculture, nevertheless they showed a very marked development in agriculture also. No trustworthy agricultural statistics are available for the 13 original States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or for many years thereafter; but it is certain that farm areas, value of farm property, and quantity and value of farm products steadily increased and were in 1850 several times greater than in 1790. Since 1850, however, there has been comparatively little increase in agriculture in the 13 original States, the growing demands for agricultural products being satisfied by the enormous development of regions farther west. The total area of farm land in the 13 original States in 1850 was 147,000,000 acres, while in 1910 it was only about 10 per cent greater, 161,000,000 acres. The acreage of improved land had increased somewhat more, from 64,000,000 acres in 1850 to 83,000,000 in 1910, or nearly one-third. In the area outside of the 13 original States, however, acreage of farm land increased from about 146,000,000 acres in 1850 to 713,000,000 in 1910, or over fivefold, and the acreage of improved land multiplied seven times. In 1850 the 13 original States had almost exactly one-half of the acreage of farm land and more than one-half of the acreage of improved land; in 1910 they had less than one-fifth of the total acreage and only a little over one-sixth of the improved acreage.

In striking contrast with these figures of agricultural industry in the thirteen original States are the figures for manufactures and commerce. While, of course, the percentage of increase in manufactures in the area outside of the thirteen original States has been much greater than within their area, the absolute amount of increase in the thirteen original States has exceeded the absolute amount of increase outside. In 1790 the total value of manufactured products for the entire United States—practically all being in the thirteen original States—was roughly estimated at $20,000,000. In 1910 the value of products of manufacturing establishments of the thirteen original States was $11,121,000,000, or nearly 600 times the figure for 120 years before. In 1850 the total value of products in the territory of the thirteen original States was $800,000,000. The increase of the past 60 years in this territory has been more than $10,300,000,000, the figure for 1910 being 14 times greater than that for 1850. While in the territory outside of the thirteen original States the value of manufactures between 1850 and 1910 multiplied nearly fifty-fold, the actual increase of about $9,330,000,000 was less than the increase during the same period in the thirteen original States.

EAST MUST BE CONSIDERED.

Considering this data from an official source, it is scarcely to be wondered at that these available eastern lands should be passed over by pioneers for the confessedly hard and hazardous work of developing land by artificial irrigation. If the pioneer is able with reasonable assistance from the Government to make his work effective upon the arid or semiarid lands, well and good. But he should not go in without full knowledge of his responsibility, since the financial aid obtained under the irrigation plan is not available to the millions of other farmers who are working out the problems of successful agriculture in lands more fertile and less remote. Nor can any comprehensive or equitable plan of distribution and development, either of population or of agriculture, be successfully worked out without taking the East into consideration.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to have the 10 minutes, but I think we ought to have some agreement about the time for debate upon this matter so that we will know who is going to speak.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that some agreement ought to be made as to time. I would like to see this bill got through

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to see if we can not get some time for limit of debate. It has been running now nearly two hours.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not used any of that time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Can not we agree on 20 minutes on a side?

Mr. MONDELL. This is a very important amendment to this bill, and it seems to me that we ought to have a fair amount of debate on this one amendment.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I want to offer, and I want a few minutes on it.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, there are several Members on this side who were promised, on last Thursday, that they would be given time. Some of them are members of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman had better get debate closed on this amendment and amendments to the amendment, because if a quorum disappears I am going to keep the Members here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to see the bill got through and become a law.

Mr. MANN. So would I.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to see Members who are in favor of the bill help to get it closed up. Does not the gentleman from Colorado think that 20 minutes on a side is sufficient?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments to it close in 40 minutes, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have 10 minutes. I can not complete what I have to say in less than that.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Here are some members of the committee that want to be heard.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let us make it an hour; there are other amendments besides this, and this is not the last call.

Mr. MONDELL. This is the last call on this amendment, I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments to this amendment be closed in one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. Before that is agreed to I would like to ask whether it will be necessary to offer amendments to this amendment before the debate is closed or after?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. No. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, is the one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; one half by me and the other half by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. GORDON. I object to that.

Mr. MANN. No; it is to be controlled by the Chair.

Mr. DONOVAN. If the time is to be controlled by the Chair, the Chair will need to watch the gentleman from Wyoming somewhat in that respect.

Mr. MONDELL. "The gentleman from Wyoming" asked unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, and I believe I have been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has been recognized and asked unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman; 5 minutes is enough. The other day the gentleman got an extension of time and spent half of that time in foolish talk.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, other gentlemen have been discussing this question for 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Connecticut, who knows nothing about it, has not seen fit to object.

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman, to more than 5 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is that the gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming has 10 minutes, has he not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asked unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, at the request of the gentleman from California, who rarely talks, and the gentleman from Wyoming, who hardly ever speaks, I am willing to withdraw my objection and allow them to talk for 10 minutes or 10 hours. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are presenting a bill proposing an extension of the period of payment on reclamation projects from 10 to 20 years. In connection with that extension of time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] proposes that there shall be interest paid at the rate of 3 per cent. He bases his contention on the proposition that if we are to loan to farmers for the purchase and development of farms money taken from the Treasury of the United States we should, in justice to all the people, charge interest on the money so loaned and advanced. I would agree with the gentleman from Indiana absolutely, if that were the proposition presented to the House; but that is not the proposition before the House at all. We are not taking money from the Treasury raised by taxation, but money received from the sale of public lands, and we are asking farmers to help the Government develop areas which could not be otherwise developed.

Let us get back to the time of the passage of the reclamation law. At that time there were within the continental boundaries of the United States nine and a half million acres under irrigation. We had reached a time when the effort of individual farmers, cooperative societies and associations, and corporations to reclaim arid lands had practically covered all of the projects that could be reclaimed at a reasonable cost; and the question agitated before Congress and argued for several years was this: Is it proper to take the proceeds of the sale of public lands and use them for the purpose of making other lands available for settlement and use? Is it proper to take this fund, of which we have given 127,000,000 acres to homesteaders, of which we have given 77,000,000 acres to the railroads, of which we have given 37,000,000 acres to the States, besides millions in cash receipts, no cent of which was ever paid back—is it proper to take this fund, which is not raised by taxation upon the people of the United States, but which comes from the sale of the public domain, and use it for the purpose of making fruitful and productive acres which otherwise would remain arid and unprofitable and useless until the day when Gabriel blows his trumpet? Remember, we did not contemplate the undertaking of a single project which was of such a character that would invite private enterprise. In other words, we did not contemplate and we have not undertaken projects which were not so difficult and expensive in their character that they could not bear the burden of an interest charge. We undertook this work because these projects could not bear an interest charge, and if there had been any suggestion whatever that we were to charge interest on this investment, we never would have undertaken the work. We undertook the work. Twenty-seven primary projects have been taken up. They have cost more than was anticipated. It has cost more to bring the acres into a condition for cultivation than was anticipated. Markets have not always developed as rapidly as we had hoped. Under these circumstances and conditions we ask what?

We ask, first, that the period within which repayment shall be made shall be extended to 20 years, and, second, that the amount to be paid each year shall be made definite. That is just as important a part of this legislation as the extension of time, because as matters now stand the Secretary of the Interior, within his authority, I believe, has so adjusted these payments as to make them very small at the beginning, enlarging them as time goes on, so that before the expiration of the 10 years they become so large that the entrymen can not meet them. We want to have the payments definite, so that people going on these projects shall know in advance just how much they have to pay and just when they have to pay it. The gentleman from New York says that we do not charge either the capital or the interest on rivers and harbors and other improvements because they are for the benefit of all of the people. So they are, in a way, and yet there are certain people who secure infinitely more benefits from them than the body of the people as a whole, and the country in which these projects are located receives practically no direct benefit at all from the millions of money that we expend for the improvement of rivers and harbors. The gentleman spoke of the Panama Canal, and he is complaining because from the proceeds of the public lands we have not paid for the Panama Canal. As patriotic citizens we are in favor of that great canal, and yet we know that the building of it will be of little direct benefit to the intermountain country. If it affects us at all, the effect is likely to be to tend to keep up our railroad rates rather than to help decrease them, and yet we are in favor of that project and we will pay our part of it for its building and its maintenance. There is scarcely an expenditure of the Government that reaches that central intermountain region which is directly beneficial to its people save the payment of pensions. But these people are not asking any special favors of the Federal Government.

The Federal Government on its own motion, not at the request of these settlers from Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Kentucky, and elsewhere who have come there, but on its own motion, out of the proceeds of the public lands—a fund that has always been held to be a public extension fund, a public improvement fund—out of the proceeds of this fund the Government says, "We will reclaim these mighty projects; we will put mighty structures across these great gorges; we will build great tunnels and great diverting works; and we will carry water to these lands, and we invite you upon them, and we ask that you shall pay every dollar back that we invest in these lands." And the settlers are willing to pay it; they are expecting to pay it; and they are desirous of paying it, and all they ask is that the terms of the payments shall be such that they can comfortably meet them. If these particular arid areas could have been irrigated and stand an interest charge, they would have been irrigated, as the other 12,000,000 acres have been irrigated, by private enterprise and individual effort; but it is because the dams are mighty and the diversion works monumental and the charge enormous that the Government, having this fund, which has always been used for internal improvements and for the development of the country, took the fund and loaned it in order that these lands may be put in the condition in which they may be farmed and reclaimed. Of course, there are not as many of these farmers as there are people in some Eastern States, but there will be some day, let us hope. Of course, they are not all of the population of the United States, but they are honest, God-fearing, self-helpful folks, and all they are asking is that they shall have such time as is necessary within which to make the payments on the acres which, had they not been developed by these works built by the Federal Government, never could have been developed and would have remained arid for all time.

How many millions have we voted for the lower Mississippi Valley this year? Three millions, is it not? And that, I think, totals up $101,000,000 spent there. I vote for these expenditures because I think them necessary, and yet I know, and everyone else knows, that a large part of that expenditure is for the protection of private property along that mighty stream rather than in the aid of navigation. That is a gift, that is a grant, as many other expenditures of the Government are, without expectation of return of the principal and no suggestion of interest. But here are expenditures which bring into full fruitage great areas that otherwise would have remained arid and unprofitable, as they are in their natural state. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada and Mr. GORDON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to speak against the amendment?

Mr. GORDON. In favor of it; the previous speaker was against it.

Mr. Chairman, I have never heard so much rotten political economy upon the floor of this House on any proposition as has been emitted by the proponents of this bill. [Applause.] Gentlemen stand up here and compare the donations provided for these arid States with the appropriations made for public highways, rivers and harbors, and railroads. There is absolutely no comparison, no analogy between those expenditures. When the Government of the United States first started on this enterprise it committed a monumental blunder, a perfectly idiotic proposition, as the gentleman from Wyoming has just demonstrated. He opens his speech by saying, "I decline to yield" [applause]; that all the lands out there which it was practical to reclaim had been reclaimed by private enterprises. Of course that is true. The lands which were practical to reclaim have been reclaimed by private individuals, and when there were no other arid lands available that any man of common sense would put his money into, then they come back to the Congress, as they always do. [Applause.] Now, they talk about a contract there. If they have any contract, they have not produced it. They have got appropriations of all the proceeds of the sale of public lands in the arid regions out there, and they have taken every dollar of it, and they have got a bond issue, I understand, of $20,000,000 besides. Now, the Government of the United States never expressly or by implication agreed to maintain these pumps, dams, and other paraphernalia out there to supply these men with water. They gave them the land, and then they appropriated the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and they have used that and they have spent it.

Now they come in here and ask to have the time extended from 10 to 20 years. I see nothing in the argument that the proceeds of the sale of the public domain is not public property. I never heard such a pretense made before until it was made in support of this bill. Of course it is public property and belongs to the Government of the United States, just as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] here demonstrated, and but for this idiotic resolution adopted in 1902 that money would have been used for public purposes and we would not be paying interest on bonds to build the Panama Canal as we now are. Talk about gifts to the railroads. Everybody who knows enough to come in out of the wet knows that the donations to railroads are given upon the theory that they are public highways and we are engaged now in trying to keep down the rates upon the theory that they are a public highway. Is not all the legislation enacted by Congress during the past 27 years based upon the theory that they are public highways? We gave them these enormous bonuses of land and money upon the express theory that they were.

Mr. SHERLEY. And if the gentleman will permit I would suggest to the gentleman, too, that the worst scandal in America grew out of the gifts to the railroads, and it is a mighty bad precedent to cite.

Mr. GORDON. Of course that is true. We gave great empires of land, enormous donations of money, under the theory of law, and it is only a theory, that they could only charge the public for using the highway a reasonable tax or toll. We created a great court here for the purpose of hearing and determining whether they are charging more than a reasonable tax or toll upon the freight and commerce of the country. But there is no analogy between such gifts as that, unwise as it was, and this. This is a pure donation to private individuals, nothing else, and they come here now and ask you to extend the time 10 years longer without any interest. I see absolutely no justification or excuse for it.

As has been very well pointed out here when you loan the people out in the arid region of Nevada and Colorado and other desert States money out of the Public Treasury without interest, how are you going to refuse to loan to the people of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, who have land that is worth something, money to improve their lands with interest? You can not escape it unless you propose to make a special favored class out of these people who have seen fit to go out there and make their homes upon the desert. Now, the reason for the Government undertaking this, of course, is perfectly apparent; it is because it is an unwise business proposition and there is a desire to saddle it upon the Government, and that is the reason why we who are here now—remember this was 12 years ago and we are not responsible for what occurred 12 years ago or what Mr. Roosevelt did—are asked to do this. This is a piece of rotten, one-sided socialism and ought to be stopped, and the Government ought to put the heel of its condemnation upon it. That is what it ought to do, and it ought to do it first by requiring these people to pay a reasonable rate of interest. Of course you will not get the money back; I do not think you will ever collect either the principal or the interest; but if you impose interest you will do one thing. You will keep a lot of other fools from going out there and trying to make a home on these desert lands. [Applause.] That is one of the good purposes that this amendment might subserve if it should pass. I heard the gentleman from New Mexico, one of the most eloquent men in this House, here last week dilate upon the horrors of the people who undertake to live out in that desert region. He said that they have to go to the towns and work upon the streets in order to make a living for their families.

I do not believe in donating the Government assets to inveigle people to go out there to try to make a living on desert lands. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says they ask no special favors from the Government. I would like to have him tell me what this is if it is not a special favor, by loaning Government money without interest to invest in a rotten business enterprise that no business man would engage in? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I can not hope in the brief time allotted to me to enter into any extended discussion of this question, but I wish to say that I have been a member of the Committee on Irrigation for several years which has had the present bill under consideration, know its contents, and hope that this amendment will be defeated.

I come from that stock of people who drove ox teams across this continent in 1849 and helped to blaze the way for western development and its present civilization. I was born in the West, and when Members speak upon this floor of the old sagebrush land as worthless land, and of irrigation as a failure, I feel that I should resent the slander on our State in the manner it deserves. A man who would not stand up for his State under those circumstances certainly would not be worthy of a position in this House. [Applause.]

I was glad to hear the position of the great leader of the majority in this House, Mr. UNDERWOOD. He stood before you and opposed this amendment. He put it before you as any statesman should put it, and not in a narrow-minded way. The President of the United States stands for this bill; the Speaker of this House stands behind the western people always, and we all know how that great ex-President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, the father of irrigation projects, stood for western development, and did what he could to develop the Western States.

Why, gentlemen, the State of Ohio, from which the gentleman who just spoke hails, does not compare any more with the State from which I come than a baby's diaper compares with a tablecloth. We can wrap the State of Ohio up in one corner of the great arid lands of Nevada. [Applause.] Nevada awaits to-day, with millions and millions of acres of public lands that only need water to make of them a paradise.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] talked about the development of rivers. Of course, his State never wants its hand in the pork barrel. Philadelphia never wants any money that she does not give back. What about the Mississippi River, the Ohio River, and all your rivers and harbors? Who gets the benefit of them? We at least will pay back the principal. You pay back nothing. Who gets the benefit of your rivers, wharves, and harbors? Why, private individuals and corporations. Talk about private individuals in the West receiving the only benefits of this bill. Who is it that gets the benefit of your rivers, wharves, and harbors if it is not the privately owned steamboats and other corporations? And yet you come here, when these poor, struggling farmers, who are trying to eke out an existence and who are trying to raise produce for all the people in these United States, and say to them, "Why, you have got to pay interest upon the money. We will not lend you a helping hand." If we get the benefit of your rivers, harbors, and wharves, do you not also get the benefit of our farms? Every tree that is grown upon those arid lands benefits the whole country. I tell you it is about time that the people of the Eastern States we have been helping all these long years should wake up and take a broader view of things.

You may want our assistance some time. I am glad to help all meritorious propositions, and I am particularly glad to help the poor old South. I am glad to see the South get a little bit of what is coming to them now, and I will vote for any appropriation that seeks to benefit them in any way. This bill will benefit all the people, and I hope it will pass without this amendment. It would be an outrage to charge those people interest. God knows their lot is a hard one, and this Government should see that they get a square deal—that is all we ask. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has agreed to recognize some members of the committee, and the time against the amendment has been pretty well spoken for. I presume the gentleman is against the amendment?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am opposed to the amendment; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, at this time, in order to expedite the consideration and passage of this bill, although I am a member of the committee, I should prefer to waive my time, as I did for that purpose last Wednesday when this matter was before the House. But this is such an important matter to my State and my district that I feel it my duty to say a few words, particularly upon this interest amendment.

Although the amendment offered to the section really relates to an interest payment by the new settlers on these projects, yet this discussion has taken such a wide range that the whole matter of interest upon the project, both for the new and the old settlers, is before the House. And for this reason I desire to make my observations particularly upon an amendment that probably will be offered to the next section, an amendment exacting the payment of interest from the old settlers upon these projects as a consideration for the proposed extension of time.

Mr. Chairman, upon the passage of the reclamation act, as is stated by H. G. Tyson, jr., of Idaho, the settlers and the Government undertook reciprocal parts in the reclamation and the settlement of the arid lands of the West. The Government impliedly in the reclamation act encouraged the settlers to believe, and made implied representations by the very terms of the act, that if the settlers would settle upon and cultivate these lands for which the Government would furnish water these lands could be reclaimed and the payments made within a 10-year period. These implied representations and inducements on the part of the Government were supplemented by actual and direct representations made by the reclamation officials in person upon the projects to prospective settlers and the farmers owning the land. These representations were, no doubt, honestly made. Relying upon these representations, the settlers and farmers went upon these lands, have spent their time and many thousands of dollars on the same. They have performed their part of that reciprocal contract. They should not now be penalized with an interest payment for the Government's mistake.

Upon one project in my State, the Klamath project, the reclamation officials held a meeting attended by 200 farmers, and told them that the lands could be reclaimed at a little greater expense than $13.65 an acre. They told these farmers that in order to be absolutely sure they would add 20 per cent, making the reclamation price $16.40 an acre. At the same time private people were there willing to take over this project and reclaim the same at a price of $15 an acre. The settlers and the farmers preferred to rely upon the representations made by the reclamation officers. They preferred a contract with the Government to a contract with private individuals, and therefore they listed their lands with the Reclamation Service. Four years after that meeting was held public notice was issued compelling the settlers to pay $30 an acre to reclaim these lands. Now, is the Government going to take advantage of its own wrong, its own misrepresentations, and exact interest from these farmers who relied upon the Government representation? Does not fair dealing demand, when it is disclosed that 20 years—not 10—is a reasonable period to make payment, that the same be granted without the added burden of interest? Why, Mr. Chairman, if the same state of facts, the same circumstances, were presented in an equity suit brought by these settlers against some private corporation making these representations to them, do you doubt for one moment but that such court of equity would decree a rescission of this contract, which would not only restore to the settlers the money they had expended upon these projects, but would reimburse them for the damages and for their loss of time? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, in the speeches made by several gentlemen this afternoon on this bill there have been two lines of argument. Certain Members have spoken for interest, at variance with a contract made in 1902, and certain Members have spoken for the farmer and the integrity of the contract of 1902. Coming from the State of Indiana we find a lawyer talking about what ought to obtain as regards the welfare of the arid-land farmer. Then we hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is a farmer, as I understand, but who owns the farm and lets the other fellow do the work, talking about what should be done as regards the interests of the arid-land farmers. And then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], a newspaper man, or something of that nature——

Mr. MOORE. A farmer's boy. [Laughter.]

Mr. FALCONER. Well, he was a boy so long ago that he has forgotten all about the vicissitudes from which the farmer suffers—cutting loose some of the bon-ton, artistic-souled sentiment of Philadelphia. And then the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] speaks against the bill and tells us what should be done as regards the farmers. I will say, in passing, that the gentleman from New York, who is close to the administration, ought to spend some time in telling the House why the Democratic administration has not lived up to its pledges and given the farmers of this country a favorable loan system, and not fight the interests of the farmers by opposing this legislation.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], whose speech was very brief, and who covered the subject as thoroughly as if he had talked for an hour, will, I am sure, find his effort fully appreciated by these men in the far West who have been brought into certain unfortunate conditions, partly on account of the insufficiency of the knowledge of the United States Government's employees in presenting the estimated cost of this reclamation proposition.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] refers to these men who are out here in the Northwest country as "fools." Others have referred to them as "poor devils." I want to submit here, these men who meet the obstructions and discouragements of the new country are the most substantial and the most wholesome class of people to be found in the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is plainly understood, and its merits are certainly evident to anyone giving it any consideration. The necessity for this particular legislation is evident from the variety and number of bills introduced by gentlemen from a number of different States.

The wisdom of the Department of the Interior in recommending this bill, covering all the good points of all the bills heretofore presented on the subject, is characteristic of the alertness and ability of the Interior Department, under the able direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. Franklin K. Lane. Surely the majority side of this House is ready to give serious consideration to the matter, and I believe serious consideration means support.

Unqualifiedly the Secretary has indorsed the bill. He has so expressed himself to many Members.

Under date of June 2, 1914, I received the following letter, which shows the necessity for the passage of the bill before August 1:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 2, 1914.

Hon. J. A. FALCONER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FALCONER: I have your letter of May 26 with respect to the payments to be made by settlers on reclamation projects. This matter has been receiving the constant attention of the department, and on May 29 I issued the following order:

"No action under order of June 23, 1913, will be taken awaiting action of Congress on extension bill. If said bill is not enacted into law by August 1, an order will be made requiring payment by August 15. If passed, an order will be made by August 15 in conformity with the terms of the new law."

The order of June 23, referred to, reduced by two-thirds the building charge last due on the water-right application of each water user and ordered that there should be no cancellation of entries or water-right applications for delinquency in payments until December 1, 1913.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

After a visit to several of the western reclamation projects Secretary Lane reported:

There is one matter of great moment to these people which should be corrected by law as soon as possible. We mistook the ability of the farmer to pay for his water rights. Ten years was the time given. His optimism and our own was too great. That time should be doubled.

The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands unanimously voted that the bill as amended should pass, and Secretary Lane urged its passage in a communication addressed to the chairman of the committee.

The Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912 says:

We believe in the conservation and the development for the use of the people of the natural resources of the country. Our forests, our sources of water supply, our arable and our mineral lands, our navigable streams, and all the other material resources with which our country has been so lavishly endowed constitute the foundation of our national wealth.

* * * * * * *

The public domain should be administered and disposed of with due regard to the general welfare.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the general welfare in connection with our arable lands is being served by the purposes of this bill. Every precaution has been taken to exclude the speculator, the land grabber, and it is strictly true, sir, that the people benefited by the extension of the payment provision are honest, industrious farmers.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, at the opposition of gentlemen on the minority side of the House.

The Republican platform of 1912 has a plank bearing directly on this matter:

We favor such fair and reasonable rules and regulations as will not discourage or interfere with actual bona fide home seekers, prospectors, and miners in the acquisition of public lands under existing laws.

* * * * * * *

We favor the continuance of the policy of the Government with regard to the reclamation of arid lands; and for the encouragement of the speedy settlement and improvement of such lands we favor an amendment to the law that will reasonably extend the time within which the cost of any reclamation project may be repaid by the landowners under it.

Gentlemen from Illinois suggest that there is much land in the rain-belt regions where settlers might locate, stating further that there is much land in Illinois where, if the Government would furnish noninterest-bearing loans, farmers would buy and settle on land.

I want to say in that connection, Mr. Chairman, that there is much land in my State—developed lands, if you please—similar, as regards development, to Illinois farms where many men now asking for extensions would gladly buy developed farms if the Government would loan low-interest money. But the Government is not doing that kind of business. The intention of the Government should be and is to develop good land, even at extra cost, on a plan by which the Government would be reimbursed.

WHAT IS THE MATTER?

What is the matter with this country, Mr. Chairman? We have heard much discussion on the floor of the House the past few months, suggesting that something was awry. The high cost of living is said to continue; social and industrial conditions are unsettled.

The Republicans call down the condemnation of the political gods on the Underwood tariff bill.

The Democrats insist that present and past unfavorable conditions are due to the result of the Republican Party policies of years past, resulting in making a few men very rich and many men very poor, and gentlemen here on the floor of the House teeter, totter, and, figuratively speaking, chase each other around the block with much gusto and a great noise, each trying to make the people of the country believe that the "other fellow" is to blame for the present apparent standstill.

Do they tell us where the trouble lies?

I will tell you, sir, what is the matter with this country: There are not men in sufficient numbers on farms producing from the soil. It would pay the United States Government to embark on a line of economic operation that would remove from the thickly settled centers a percentage of the population and place them with Government aid on the lands of the country.

There are too many drones—nonproducers—in the country; too many doing the "middleman" act—making money off of the other fellow, the other fellow who produces. This, sir, answers the question: What is the matter?

And here we are to-day, 435 Congressmen—the producer might suggest too many—considering the advisability of making it possible for real men, men who produce from the soil, to meet the demands that certain unfavorable conditions have placed upon them.

These men with families have denied themselves and have gone through stringent times, real—not "statesmen-talk"—hard times to the end that they might finish the work of development; converting the waste desert of arid lands, once inhabited by sagebush and sand lizards, into habitable homesteads and eventually reach a standard of reclamation and a state of cultivation that excels in richness of production and attendant comforts of life.

And yet we hesitate, we try to make ourselves wonder whether the Government should assist actual farmers who are now on the lands engaged in earnest endeavor to honorably carry out their end of a contract.

We, the Congress, sir, should not hesitate to extend the conditions of the original contract on the same lines, too, since the costs have been so much greater than originally estimated by the Government engineers in charge. And we should make new contracts and amend our laws to favor farm settlement.

Mr. Chairman, the Government should do all this bill suggests; the responsibility is upon this Congress. We are a grand country, with immense natural resources, good men, and brave women; but in our endeavor to "beat the world" in science and in trade we have neglected a more important matter—farm development and production. We should certainly treat our people as well as Australia does her people, but as a matter of fact we do not. Certain States of Australia not only provide money for development of farm lands, but furnish public overseers, experts in agricultural matters, to oversee and advise the man who is trying to work out new methods attendant upon the new country conditions, incidentally shielding the settler from the machinations of the land shark. Then the Government furnishes 75 per cent of the money necessary to build a house and clears, grades, and seeds one-fourth of his land.

The farm-loan branch of their State or Government money system accrues to the benefit of the man who borrows. Workmen who make their weekly or monthly deposits of savings get usually 3 per cent, and the banks loan to farmers at a rate of 4½ per cent, or at 6 per cent if it is desired, and 1½ per cent goes into a sinking fund, so that at the end of 31 years the interest and principal are entirely paid.

The thing needed most in this country is to get the man who loans and the man who borrows together with the least possible administration charges, and the way to do it is through a Government medium. There are many Congressmen here who probably would hesitate in adopting the suggestion that we employ a Government system of farm finance. It appears to be a somewhat radical change, but surely the bill under consideration can not be objected to on any substantial grounds, for this bill simply carries out the principle of the original reclamation bill of 1902.

Mr. Chairman, there are many people in my State interested in this measure. I am daily in receipt of communications urging its passage, and I sincerely hope it may pass to-day, conforming in noninterest-bearing features with the original contract of 1902 and with section 16 restored to the bill as it was reported to the Senate. [Applause.]

[Mr. HENSLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that gentlemen opposed to this amendment have consumed 33 minutes of the hour allotted for discussion of this amendment, and the gentlemen for it have consumed 5 minutes. The understanding was that the time was to be as equally divided as possible.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this amendment, although I do not know that if I were writing it into a law I would write it in just the way it is now presented. If the amendment is agreed to, of course it will go back to the Senate and probably into conference.

I think myself that the time for the payment of the principal of the construction charge ought to be extended even beyond 20 years, because the construction charge on these reclamation projects amounts to what would in ordinary cases be the purchase price of the land. And while a farmer in Illinois buys a piece of land even for $150 an acre and gives a mortgage for a considerable portion of the purchase price, due in five years, he knows that at the end of that time he can secure an extension of that mortgage or can secure another mortgage with which to pay off the first mortgage.

In this case, in the reclamation project, the construction charge must be paid to the Government at the time stated—paid theoretically, at least. It has not been lived up to, so far, but we may consider that that is the case. So that the man who pays for his farm on a reclamation project, under the form of paying the construction charge, ought to have a sufficient time in which to realize the total cost. Usually that could not be done in 10 years, and, with the payment of interest, probably could not be done often in 20 years. It could easily be done in 30 or 40 years, with the payment of interest. Now, under the existing law, they are required to pay the entire construction charge in 10 years, in the main without interest. Probably that was a mistake, and put an undue burden where the construction charge amounted to $40, $50, $60, $70, $80, $90, or $100 an acre; although in Illinois, where I was raised, farms sell at from $150 to $250 an acre, for farm purposes, and no one pretends that they can raise as much per acre on that land as it is claimed they can raise per acre on the irrigated land.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. For my own information I want to ascertain just what funds these people who pay this money are now paying interest on and what they are not paying interest on.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, they will have to pay interest, as a part of the construction charge, on any portion of the $20,000,000 raised from the sale of bonds authorized a few years ago. But they do not pay interest on anything else.

Mr. GARNER. This proposition is that they shall pay interest, not only on the $20,000,000, but on all the money out of the public lands that has gone into the reclamation fund.

Mr. MANN. The proposition now pending before the House does not affect anyone now on the projects. It only affects those who go on hereafter.

Now, I am inclined to think that where we entered into a contract with those now on these projects, it would not be advisable to require them to pay interest up to the time practically that their loan is extended, but if they ask for an extension, as they do in this bill, I can see no reason why they should not pay interest on the payments which are deferred, without any injustice to them. After all, this is a fundamental proposition of government: Has the Government the moral right to engage in an enterprise as a business enterprise which can not afford to pay interest for the use of the money? The Government of the United States could use this $80,000,000, which has been expended on reclamation projects, in the purchase of land in Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, New England, or New York, and give that land to farmers who would take it, furnishing enough money to place the man on the farm, and he would be glad to pay interest for the use of the money; and if that had been done, it would have produced more sustenance than will be produced by the same amount of expenditure on the irrigation projects. You could have bought plenty of land in those States for $10 an acre, much of it cheaper than that, land which many people would be glad to go upon and cultivate and raise crops. But can the Government as a fundamental proposition afford to do this where the results do not warrant any interest payment? Because that is the test of the value of money. Do the irrigation projects pay if the farmers on them can not make money enough to pay a low rate of interest for the money which has gone into the making of the place?

I do not believe in grinding any of these people. I believe we ought to encourage them. I have no doubt that they would be able to pay interest. If I had my way about it, I think I would make a principal payment for a number of years of not to exceed 1 or 2 per cent, but would require the payment of interest. As a man gets his farm under cultivation and secures a ready and perhaps near market for the products of his farm, he can afford to pay a higher proportion of the principal, while he is at the same time having the amount of his interest reduced.

But no man in this House can go to the country and to his constituents and defend a proposition for the Government to loan money for the farmers in Montana, in Wyoming, in Washington, in Idaho, in Colorado, in Nevada, New Mexico, and Arizona, and California, and refuse to give the credit of the Government to farmers in New England and New York, who are just as anxious to get the land and make money out of the soil as are the farmers elsewhere. [Applause.] If you loan the money in one instance without interest, how can you defend the refusal to advance the credit of the Government in the other case without interest?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The pressing problem in my immediate section is to get the water off the land rather than to get it on. Would there be any difference in principle in loaning the money without interest to the farmers of the States the gentleman has mentioned and to the landowners in my immediate section to drain the land?

Mr. MANN. I think not. I lived on the prairies of Illinois, when in the spring of the year I could make a little raft and pole it over every portion of the township except a few high spots, raised a few feet above the level of the rest of the land, where the houses were. And between the house in which I lived and the barn where our horses and cattle were kept was a river, in the spring of the year, rods wide, over which we had to build a bridge. That country needed drainage; the land was of little value. Now it is tile drained and thoroughly ditched by the expenditure of money raised by these people themselves. If they could have gotten the credit of the Government to borrow money at 3 per cent they would have been well off. They paid a much higher rate than 3 per cent, and they did not have the length of time now proposed in which to pay back the principal; and yet the expenditure of money which they made for draining has well paid them. They raise great crops now, as these people on the reclamation projects will raise.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does not the gentleman see a distinction between lands in private ownership and lands the Government owned where irrigation projects were installed?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a further question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois imagine that one of these men in the Salt River Valley could have been induced by a representative of the Government to enter on that project if he had known that instead of costing $15 an acre the project would cost $60 an acre?

Mr. MANN. I met a gentleman the other day who had passed quite a time at Phoenix. He told me that they were asking $150 and $200 an acre on these reclamation projects now, subject to the construction charge to be paid the Government, and they want an extension of time for the payment of the construction charge without interest. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed 13 minutes. The Chair stated that the other side had consumed 33 minutes. That was a mistake; it should have been 28 minutes. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, underneath the proposition of those who say the settlers should not pay interest lie two premises that in my judgment are unsound. First, that the public domain belongs peculiarly to the section in which it happens to be, instead of belonging to all the people of America; second, that because it is public domain it is proper to do with it what you would not do if it was private land.

Now, there is a clear distinction between the Government giving land to a settler ready for cultivation and the Government giving land to a settler with an undertaking to expend money on the land in order to make it useful for the settler.

The difference is fundamental. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] clearly pointed out, when you go into the improvement of land you put the Government into a business that should at least economically justify itself. The Government, under some conditions, might well give away the land of the public domain for settlement and stop there. Men might justify it on the basis of being the means of creating homesteads. But when the Government goes a step further, and not only undertakes to give the land but undertakes to enter into a business project to make the land worth settling, then you are faced with an economical proposition, and in order to justify that undertaking you must show that the thing you propose to do is worth doing economically. If it is not able to bear an interest charge, it is manifestly not worth doing, and you are driven back every time to the proposition presented by the gentleman from Illinois that if you are going to give the land to these people and make it, through a business enterprise, suitable for them without charging them any interest on the investment, the Government must be willing to do the same thing for all the country everywhere, and yet that means socialism beyond the dream of anybody in America.

If you will search the speeches of every one of the gentlemen from the public-land States, you will find that back of them lies the opinion that, somehow or other, this land is their State's peculiar property and that it is the duty of the National Government to treat it for their especial benefit in a way different from that it would employ as to land elsewhere. Why, analogies have been made here that are comical. Men have permitted their eloquence to run away with their judgment. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], usually conservative in his utterances, made comparisons that would not stand analysis for half a minute. The difference between a river and harbor improvement, the difference between aids to navigation, such as lighthouses, the difference between a Government undertaking such as these and those in connection with irrigation projects is this, that the thing improved does not go into private ownership for the benefit of the private individual, to be used as a profit for the individual. There is no more comparison between the two than there is between night and day, and nobody would know it better than the gentleman from Alabama if he thought for just one moment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. This money, the gentleman says, does not go for private profit. Does the gentleman realize that the money there on these plants, not on the farms, but on these big plants, goes into a public enterprise for a vast number of people?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not; because it is not a public enterprise by any stretch of the imagination. It is the property of the settlers who take up the land under the reclamation project, who pay for the cost of maintaining it, and who get the profit from the increased fertility of the land thereby made tillable.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does not the gentleman know that many of these projects are undertaken and constructed, to quite an extent, before there are any settlers upon them?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; and that is just it. Here is a business enterprise undertaken for certain private parties at the time unknown, but nevertheless for private parties, who shall come in on the land after the project has been completed and reap the benefits in the fertility of the soil brought about by virtue of the project when it has been completed. It is useless, from my point of view, to argue with a man who can not see the distinction between an improvement that is usable by the whole country and an improvement which is for the benefit of private individuals, no matter how numerous.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does not the gentleman know that many of these settlers were induced to go there under what would have been misrepresentation if it had been a matter suggested by a private individual or a corporation?

Mr. SHERLEY. They may have been so induced; and one of the vices of the present bill is that now, in the light of your 10 years of failure, you are undertaking to induce more men to go there at Government expense. [Applause.] That is the trouble with your whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that the law should be repealed?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think before you went on with a lot of your projects you ought to consider whether they are really worth going on with. You are very much in the situation of a man who has put a sum of money into an unprofitable business. He is a stockholder, let us say, in a corporation that has not made good. There is a call for subscription on the stock. He has to put up more money on that which is sunk.

If he is a wise man, the question that he asks himself is this: Is there enough merit anywhere in the project to warrant the expending of additional money over that which heretofore has given no sufficient return? I question very much whether under that test some of your reclamation systems would not absolutely fall to the ground. But instead of doing that you propose not only to put more money into every project that you have started, but to put money into new ones, and to induce people to go out there under conditions that, according to the gentleman's statement, are so difficult as to make it our duty to warn rather than to induce men to go there.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman tell us what he would do with this condition?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will tell you what I would do. I would make these projects bear the practical test that things bear in the commercial life of a people. The best test of a thing is whether it can stand on its own feet, and if it can not stand with an interest charge at a Government rate, infinitely lower than can be obtained from any private source, then it is of such doubtful caliber that I, for one, am not willing to go into the Treasury to back it up. [Applause.]

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a question.

Mr. FALCONER. The money is expended, the ditches are dug, and what we want to do is to get men to go in and file on the land, to come in under the ditches, and that is the only way to pay it off.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may or may not be so; you may be able to pay it off that way, but what you are doing under the terms of this bill is to provide for entering upon new projects. The terms of your bill so provide.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. I am confused, and I would like to know if the gentleman thinks there is need of stopping to see whether this thing will be economically wise?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well; I can answer the gentleman by saying that the proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof. If you provide economical conditions, then if it pays it will be economically sound; but if it will not pay, if it will not bear such conditions, it would not be economically wise.

Mr. DECKER. How is it that the land is worth $150 an acre, or that much is asked, if it is not economically sound?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is one of the conflicts that come in the testimony here. One gentleman stands up and depicts the horrors of the settler who has to come to town and work on the streets in order to keep his family from starving, while another gentleman states that under one of these schemes the land is worth from $150 to $200 an acre.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a question.

Mr. DAVIS. I judge from the gentleman's statement and argument he thinks the Reclamation Service has been a failure. Such being the case, what would the gentleman suggest now would be the remedy for those already in process of construction?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have answered that question. I would suggest as to the future you put each project upon a business basis——

Mr. DAVIS. True.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then if it does not stand, it is proof that we ought not to expend the Government money on it.

Mr. DAVIS. What are you going to do with the present projects now authorized?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would grant an extension of time and let those men pay some interest, I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks for one minute additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman in candor I believe the position of you men from the arid States would be infinitely stronger if you had come in here with a bill dealing with the actual settlers who are out there now upon the reclamation projects. I might have been willing to strain a point on the theory that those men have gone there under misapprehension, just as we take care of other unfortunates over the land; but when you come here with a scheme to swallow up all the revenues from all the public lands left in those States in the perpetuation of a scheme that is a self-confessed failure, then I for one am not willing to accept it.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman thinks we had better pocket present losses on what we have now?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I suspect there will be some evidence in that direction in the near future.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me it would be impossible for me to present the reasons which clearly to my mind justify this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the danger to the country that would follow from the Government engaging in a business which is purely of a private character, and the charge is made that this bill is class legislation. The purpose of this bill, as I view it, is to take the Government out of the reclamation business, and not to put the Government into that business. We can pass legislation here that will impose further penalties upon the settlers on these projects, that will give them an additional burden of expense in the shape of an interest charge; but we will then be forced to adopt the proposition made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to extend the annual payments by a number of years, which, to my mind, will produce a continuation of present difficulties and impose further hardships on the deserving settlers. The people living on these projects are among our most worthy citizens, and have given the best that is in them to the development of these reclamation undertakings. The results that have followed their labor and self-sacrifice fully justify the wisdom of the reclamation act of 1902. The Government could well afford to appropriate without reservation the sums already expended on reclamation projects and those required to bring them to completion. The return to the country in productive energy would be ample compensation for this expenditure, and the benefits derived thereby would not be local but general in character. Merely to show what has taken place in one section of Colorado where one of the reclamation projects has been developed, I append a statement showing the growth of population and increase of value of farm property in two Colorado counties—Delta and Montrose. The counties named contain the land reclaimed through the construction of the Gunnison Tunnel. These figures are taken from the last census reports: Growth of population.

County.	1910	1900	Increase.
			Per cent.
Delta	13,688	5,487	149.5
Montrose	10,291	4,535	126.9

Increase in value of farm property.

County.	1910	1900	Increase.
			Per cent.

The heroism and industry of the people who undertook the reclamation of the arid regions of the West entitle them to recognition by Congress. I am surprised that Representatives from the East and from the South, sections which have been the recipients of governmental favor for the last quarter of a century and even longer, should come into this House to-day and challenge the right of Congress to legislate in behalf of these deserving people. Why, Mr. Chairman, the millions of dollars that have been spent in the development of these projects have largely gone into the trade centers of the East. To-day from the western country are coming the products of the farmers and of the settlers upon reclamation projects to supply the railroads, largely owned in the East, and the investors of the East with dividends and profits upon their investment. As population increases in the West there is an enlarged demand for manufactured goods from the trade centers of the East. No one section of this country can be benefited without enriching other sections. I am surprised that when these hardy and worthy men come here and ask for consideration and for that relief to which they are entitled, they should be opposed by Representatives from the great centers who have received the benefit of their toil and the reward of their industry. Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, that we must provide a plan that will take the Government out of the reclamation business. Twelve years ago the Government was put into the reclamation business, and it was a business that was not understood in all of its ramifications and details. There were many problems that arose after the inauguration of the projects that required great engineering skill, that required amplification of the projects, that required numerous departures from the plans proposed, and imposed a great burden of expense upon those who have settled upon or purchased the land so reclaimed. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is absolutely wrong, in my judgment, to impose the burden of all the mistakes and of all of the errors of the Reclamation Service, of this enlargement of projects, of these failures, so called, upon the very people who are trying by their self-denial and by the toil of their hands to reclaim these arid wastes and add to the productive energies and development of the country.

Mr. Chairman, these people are not asking for charity. They are not coming before Congress pleading for special benefits. They are asking that Congress will simply allow them to work out their destiny under terms and conditions not of their own choosing, but upon liberal terms and conditions imposed upon them by the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the pending measure has brought prominently to the attention of the House the divergent views which exist as to the details of the future policy that should be followed in carrying forward the great work of reclaiming our arid lands. It will be noted with supreme satisfaction that but little criticism is given to the principle itself which underlies the reclamation of arid lands as undertaken under the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902, commonly known as the reclamation law. The country has become fully converted to the wisdom and farsighted statesmanship which inaugurated the reclamation policy. This policy is now everywhere regarded as fundamentally sound and a fit companion piece of legislation with the homestead law, and in the years to come, like the homestead law, the beneficient results that will flow from this act in ever-increasing volume will constitute an imperishable monument to the wisdom of its founders.

The prime purpose and object of the reclamation act is to devote the proceeds arising from the sale and disposal of public lands toward the making of other unproductive desert lands habitable and suitable for homes for the people. It is now generally conceded that the thought and basic principle of the reclamation policy is precisely similar to that which inspired the homestead law, and, those voicing their opposition to this measure to-day, had they been members of a former Congress, would have as vigorously condemned the policy of giving public domain away for free homes for the people under our homestead law.

Both of these great measures must be considered on the broad grounds of the building up and developing of a great Nation. It is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy to restrict our vision only to the dollar-and-cents aspect in the larger questions involving our permanent national welfare. We are building for all time. We are extending the opportunity for agricultural pursuits and furnishing a vent for the evils of the congestion that unfortunately in increasing degree menaces our large cities. It is a truism that "man is disposed to do the least where nature does the most," and in those portions of the earth where large human efforts are demanded in order to triumph over the obstacles of nature will be found the most virile, progressive, intelligent, God-fearing people. As a Nation we pride ourselves in doing big things. We have spanned the continent with great iron highways. We freely devote our means and efforts for the improvement of harbors and waterways. We have just completed the world's greatest engineering achievement, the construction of the Panama Canal. We are actively engaged in conserving our water resources in the arid regions, and transforming the waste places into fields and happy homes wherein "thanksgiving and the voice of melody" supplant the awful stillness and desolation of the desert.

Regardless of the immense outlay in these undertakings, every patriotic citizen rejoices in every enterprise permanently contributed to our national welfare and prosperity. We ought not to allow a sectional feeling to possess us in the consideration of larger national policies. I have no envy for those sections in which vast sums are expended for rivers and harbors and other national purposes, and likewise gratefully appreciate the same generous and patriotic purpose evinced by the Representatives of the more humid regions toward the reclamation policy. The chief concern should be that a wise and economical expenditure of such appropriations be made for the permanent public welfare.

Now, what is the proposition confronting the Government in respect to the reclamation of our arid lands? The Government has vast areas of public domain in the so-called arid States which on account of the insufficiency of the rainfall remain unoccupied and desolate. But by conserving the water resources available and applying water on these lands they become susceptible of cultivation and suitable for homes. Through what is being accomplished it may be verily said: "The waste places are made glad and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as a rose, for in the wilderness shall waters break out and streams in the desert." The parched ground shall exult in fertility and be clad in plenty.

The hardy pioneer has accomplished a great deal. Through his sacrifice and determination the dull gray expanse of sagebrush plains has been transmuted in a beautiful Mosaic of green meadow, golden grain, and ripening orchards. He has demonstrated the efficicacy of irrigation and revealed the perennial fertility of the desert when combined with magic element. To the devout and earnest pioneers of Utah all honor is due for what they have done in the interest of western development. They were the first in the Rocky Mountain region to illustrate and proclaim the marvelous fertility of the parched and forbidding sagebrush lands when reclaimed by irrigation. From our earliest settlement irrigation has been applied successfully by the people of Utah in the cultivation of fields, gardens, and orchards. Our mountain streams were early diverted to this use by the unremitting industry and enterprise of those hardy pioneers.

The future development of irrigation in Utah must depend, therefore, upon the conservation of the flow waters. The Reclamation Service has undertaken but one irrigation scheme in Utah—the Strawberry project—which is designed to furnish water for 50,000 to 60,000 acres of land in one of the richest and most populous sections of the State. The project, though not a large one, is most interesting and important in the extent of its benefits. By means of a tunnel through the rim of the Great Basin water which now flows to the Pacific Ocean is conducted into the Salt Lake Valley, thereby permanently increasing the water resources of the Great Basin. Under this project the water, after discharging its duty of irrigation on the uplands, will eventually find its way to the Utah Lake, where by pumping it can be made available to irrigate lands in an adjoining county, thus performing a double duty.

But while the reclamation project in Utah is not a large one compared with other feasible projects of greater extent and benefit that could have been undertaken in the State, and which still await future development, it is only just to say that no project of its size and kind contains superior strategic conditions to insure its success both as a sound and sure investment and as an enterprise conferring lasting benefit upon its water users. The activities of the Reclamation Service in constructing irrigation works in and of itself, however, does not measure the extent of such development in the arid States. During the past decade a tremendous impetus has been imparted to private initiative and enterprise, and many private irrigation projects have been inaugurated in the arid States. Without in the least decrying the work of the Reclamation Service, I want to point to what has been accomplished in my own State with its reservoir fund. This fund arises from a grant of 500,000 acres of land for reservoir purposes contained in the enabling act of 1894. The proceeds from the disposal of these lands constitute a reservoir fund from which loans have been made to encourage private irrigation enterprises. The State of Utah also has constructed two large reservoirs with the requisite canals to irrigate large tracts of State land. From the splendid accomplishment in irrigation under our State administration I can say that undoubtedly liberal grants of land for reclamation purposes to the several arid States would prove an effective supplement to the general Federal reclamation policy.

The States thereby could promote the building of smaller projects capable of private or State development, and the Reclamation Service could find an ample field in constructing feasible irrigation systems beyond the capacity of private capital. When the Government entered upon the construction of irrigation works under the reclamation act the Reclamation Service was obliged to break new ground and blaze out new paths of experience. It is too much to say that mistakes were not made in some instances in the beginning, but in the light of experience and in the development and growth of the work a more competent and efficient organization has been effected so that serious mistakes have been reduced to a minimum. The annual report of the Reclamation Service is a full and comprehensive account of the magnitude of the constructive work carried on under it. From this report the following tables shed considerable light on its past and present operations.

From the following statements it will be seen that about $86,000,000 has already been expended on the various irrigation projects now in the process of completion, reclaiming an area of about 3,000,000 acres. New lands are being opened to settlement as fast as settlers can be found willing to settle upon them. The terms and conditions of payment for the construction charges under the reclamation projects were necessarily fixed without any accurate knowledge of what the cost would be per acre under the various projects or of the ability of the entryman and landowner to comply with the same. Those who are now seeking new homes are willing to give the only wealth they have—their brawn and brain—to the problem of reclaiming these lands, but the money to meet the construction charges must be wrested from the soil by the industry and skill of the settler. Under the terms and conditions of the existing law the settler hesitates to assume the obligations imposed in entering these lands, and many of those who have made entry find themselves unable to meet these obligations. The Secretary of the Interior has investigated conditions, and earnestly given his sanction to granting proper relief. This demand has met with generous consideration by Congress, and there appears a general desire to lighten the burdens resting upon the settlers. The Representatives from the arid States whose constituents are chiefly interested have approved the relief afforded in the present bill.

The States in which the irrigation work is being carried on are most vitally interested in this bill. The reclamation policy is vital to their future growth and development, and they are by far the most directly concerned in securing wise legislation to effectuate its extension and development.

The reclamation fund is a revolving fund, and the more speedily construction charges can be returned the more rapidly can the expansion of irrigation go forward. With this supreme object before them, the Representatives from these States present this bill, believing that its enactment will be a measure of justice and relief to the brave and stout-hearted men who have entered these lands, and will encourage others to engage in the praiseworthy effort of redeeming the waste places. It will give heart to the settlers and induce occupation of available lands, and, instead of delaying the progress of irrigation, will result in increased returns to the reclamation fund and correspondingly provide the means for future expansion and development. It is farthest from my purpose to inject into my remarks anything that might have a political flavor, and yet I feel constrained to invite attention to some of the conditions which now confront the husbandman in the West and which will become more acute with the increase of agricultural products. We are far removed from the great waterways and marts of the East. The great distances to be covered and the heavy expense of transportation by rail compel the farmer to rely largely on the home market or restrict his operations to producing that which can bear a heavy freight charge. Many sections of the West where irrigation is necessary have been found splendidly adapted to the production of sugar beets.

The beet-sugar industry has proved a blessing to the people wherever it has been established, and under fair and favorable conditions will make rapid growth and expansion. Sugar-beet culture necessarily increases the opportunity for healthful employment for boys, and inculcates in them habits of industry, so essential to future success. It results in improved and better cultivation of the soil, by which the land is brought to a high state of fertility. It is a ready-money crop, and enters into competition with no other product of the soil; but, on the contrary, every acre devoted to the sugar-beet culture is removed from competition with other crops and contributes to making a market for them. We have embarked upon the reclamation policy, and have spent millions in constructing irrigation works.

and many more millions will be expended in the rotation scheme provided. We are interested in smoothing the rugged pathway of the desert pioneer, as evidenced by this bill; but the most substantial, enduring, and effective help we can give is to open to him the opportunity of utilizing his lands to the best advantage in the production of the most valuable crops. The products taken from the soil largely go out in exchange for the products of other American labor. The sugar thus produced, in addition to making us independent for a necessary food supply, is exchanged for other American products, and simply results, in its final analysis, to an exchange of labor between American producers.

I am pleased to know that the importance of the sugar industry has at last dawned upon the present administration and that an investigation of it has been undertaken. It is so important an industry, and fraught with such manifest, direct, and indirect benefits that it is cruel and inexcusable to make it the football of politics. From the standpoint of our agricultural development and national welfare, an industry so admirably adapted to our soil and climate and so necessary to our food supply ought to be permitted to live and expand. And all that is asked is that the toilers who are engaged in it shall be given the consideration of other producers who compete against the paltry paid labor of other countries. The sugar industry ought not to be regarded as a political asset. We should approach its consideration on the broad principle of our national welfare, and take a common-sense, practical course to insure its reestablishment, extension, and permanency as a great auxiliary to our matchless agricultural production.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, we have spent the entire day on this matter of interest. The unspeakable agony some of these gentlemen have evinced because the settlers on these reclamation projects are not able to redeem the agreements they have made is enough to bring tears to the eyes of the stanchest and most stalwart. Here comes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is justly proud of the fact that he is the owner of a 1,900-acre farm in Illinois. They say land is worth about $250 per acre down there, so here you have better than a half-million-dollar farm. I know the gentleman obeyed the law in acquiring that farm, but that he derived the lucky dog's advantage of rotten laws I would risk a wager. He thinks we should compel these western settlers on these reclamation projects to settle up in the 10 years allowed or else pay a penalty of 3 per cent per annum, which he calls interest.

Why did they not put interest in the original act? Because interest did not belong there. There were men then in Congress that knocked the West and those who were settling the West, but Congress would not think then of interest. Then it was considered a splendid policy to get men with families onto these lands that were arid and utterly worthless. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of the Republican minority, who is leading the fight for interest here to-day, recently mentioned in debate the fact that when this reclamation bill was being first considered some Member had made a forceful speech against it and he had advised him not to put that speech in the RECORD, for if he did, "it would live hereafter to plague him." The advice was followed, and later this very man was praised for helping out the cause of reclamation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was for the bill then. He did not vote against the bill because 10 years were to go by without interest. If it was right then, is there any logic in declaring it wrong now—assess a 3 per cent penalty on these people for not meeting the payments promptly?

Every man who thinks knows that the land laws are wrong in this country. We want to encourage small farms and discourage absentee landlordism. The gentleman who owns his 1,900-acre farm in Illinois and collects dividends from it may have a good farm—I hope he has—but it would be better if such areas were broken up into smaller tracts and more families were given a chance. That is what the Reclamation Service is doing.

I am not going to plead for these people as "poor devils" or any other kind of unfortunates here seeking charity. The Reclamation Service is one of the very first of the activities of this Government in efficiency and accomplishment. It has scored a rousing and a wonderful success, and the people out there may have been poor devils when they lived in Chicago and Philadelphia, but now they have their eyes turned toward the light; hope is in their hearts and buoyancy in their step. They have fought a hard fight, and there is tremendous work ahead. They left the tenement behind them, and, with overworked wife and children with sallow complexions, they settled out there to have a home. They have worked hard, and they will keep on working. Little towns have sprung up in every direction. There are 14,000 farmers. With their families and their hands there are 140,000 of them engaged in the farming, but that does not limit their activity. There are canning factories and machine and repair shops, stores, farming-implement agencies, sawmills to supply lumber, doctors, lawyers, nurses, newspapers, book dealers, churches and preachers, schools and school-teachers—oh, there are a thousand activities.

Let these knockers that call these men who settle out there fools rear up here on their hind legs and chatter and gibber all they want, but the people of this country are back of those reclamation projects, and the settlers out there know they will get a square deal. Is not the country richer by having those beautiful little enterprising cities on these arid plains rather than to have blinding sands to blow into the faces of the tourists as they pass through those vast areas? Can not you gentlemen see any advantage to the public and gain to the Treasury? Is not the corporation tax increased and the incomes enlarged for the purposes of taxation? The railroads are stimulated to spend large sums for betterments.

I shall say some more a little later about the Reclamation Service itself and its officials. Too much can not be said in their praise for their splendid accomplishments; but let me say now some more about these settlers and their problems. The Government's investment is about $80,000,000

The lands are not nearly all settled, owing mainly to the fact that interest sharks have prevented this Government from pursuing a liberal enough policy to hold those who would have filled up the lists, but who have gone to Canada, where the settler can borrow money to help him along. In Australia the Government lends a settler who will spend $1,000 on his place $600 in cash. They think a citizen and a farmer with his family producing wealth is worth something, but there are some on this floor who do not seem to think such an asset is worth 3 cents.

The settler on one of these little farms has a tremendous job ahead of him. If everything goes well and nothing unexpected happens, he must ditch and drain and build. He must have horses and feed them, poultry, farm animals. He must grade and level and plow. He must buy lumber and implements. Expense at every turn. Then he must pay the Government for the water he gets in the way of operating expenses. He has no title to his land, for a tremendous mortgage is on it for the full amount of the Government's investment. Then he has to buy seed and trees and plant his crop and suffer losses till he learns from experience just how to proceed. He may lose part of his crop for mistakes about drainage, or his money may have given out and he lost because he was denied things that he very badly needed. He had underestimated his crop—an invariable feature in every line of endeavor.

I am unable to understand why men on this floor will refuse to appreciate these facts and will not see the asset the Government has in an enterprise of this kind. We are to get every cent of it back, dollar for dollar. It is public-lands money put into a revolving fund. But now that the settler asks for time, you say, "Yes; give them time, but we must have interest."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], palms up, says, "Pisness is pisness. This can give time, but we need the interest." Yet he nearly talked himself into utter exhaustion to try to force through here a scheme to get the Government to buy a lot of waste lands in Philadelphia, near a powder plant, which was worthless almost and was not needed and yet to cost a very large sum. He takes relays with other gentlemen here in pleading for "protection for the infant industries of Pennsylvania." He wants the Government to take from the people a sum of money to swell the profits of every trust-owned factory in his State—the infant industry known as the Steel Trust, the textile mills, and the shipping plants. He did not mind helping the ships with free tolls, but a farmer on the reclaimed arid plains of the West, making an American home, creating wealth, bringing up citizens who will fight for the flag when called, are not worth 3 cents. "Pisness is pisness."

The millions they do not collect for the Government but let trusts absorb through unconscionably high tariffs never come back to the people. I believe in a big Navy, but I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] making an argument for a big Navy with which I can not agree. He said the building of a ship was justified because the spending of the money by the Government put it into circulation and created work; yet he sees nothing of this kind in the reclamation work, notwithstanding the fact that every dollar is to come back, the Government holding title to everything till every cent is paid. Is there any other expenditure the Government makes that will ever come back? They talk about their lands, but the Government has lost title to them, and of course we can not take them up in great reclamation projects.

They are behind in their arguments on this subject. The Government does not ask interest on its post-office investments, its public buildings; all it asks of the Post Office Department is to pay expenses. Profit is all some men can get into their heads, but the Government is not looking for the kind of profits they talk about here to-day. These tremendous plants out there were necessary to make the lands fit for homestead.

The great forest reserves are not operated for profit. The reserved coal does not bear dividends. When we develop fully the system to use the forests and the coal all the Government wants is cost price.

U. S. does not stand for Uncle Shylock.

If we ever do get enough honorable energy into this House to reserve the radium deposits from private control, we will not do that for profits. We did not build the Alaska railroad for profits. We will be satisfied to get cost of operation and a small part each year on the investment. The Government one day will own all the railroads. I suppose these Uncle Shylock patriots will expect the Government to get 3 per cent on $20,000,000,000 for dividends like the Goulds, the Vanderbilts, and the Morgans—nearly two millions a day that would be. That is not the plan at all, and it is time the Uncle Shylocks came to themselves.

Now, as to the Reclamation Service, that work has been splendidly done.

The estimates as originally and roughly made for projects during the period of reconnoissance have no bearing, as they did not obligate the Government to construct anything. I understand that the estimated cost contemplated by law, as announced by the Secretary of the Interior when a project is formally opened, has not greatly exceeded the amount originally anticipated in those projects which were built in accordance with the original plans. On the Salt River project in Arizona the original expenditure contemplated was about $4,000,000. After the work began the people urged the Secretary to modify the plans by increasing the height of the Roosevelt Dam, by developing power, by constructing a million-dollar diversion dam, and by purchasing and enlarging a number of the old canal systems. The investment now is $10,500,000. The estimated cost of the work originally planned is very close to the actual cost of construction. Nearly every one of the larger projects shows similar expansions and alterations, most of which were ordered by the Secretary of the Interior in response to urgent requests of the landowners.

In planning the projects of the Reclamation Service it was assumed in the estimates that the Government would construct the reservoirs and the main canals, leaving to the farmers the building of the distribution systems, as has been practiced on many of the earlier private irrigation systems. Inasmuch as the distribution systems in irrigation projects cost from $10 to $20 per acre, the adding of the construction of distribution systems to the original plans for the various projects in which this was not included in the original estimate has increased the cost of those projects from $10 to $20 per acre. Where a portion of the distribution system only was planned for and afterwards a complete distribution system was built, the cost per acre has been proportionately increased. The fact that these distribution systems have been built does not mean that the work has been performed extravagantly, but merely means that the water user has been furnished a more complete irrigation system than it was originally planned he should have.

So far as the principal projects of the Reclamation Service are concerned, they were largely planned and estimates of their costs made during 1903 and 1904. As I have already shown, the price of labor at this time was considerably lower than it was during the succeeding years. It is well known that labor was cheaper during 1903 and 1904 than during 1905 and succeeding years. Records of the Reclamation Service show that the average rate of wages on the projects under construction by the Reclamation Service in 1906 was 18 per cent higher than in 1905, and in 1907 was 20 per cent higher than in 1905, and these increases would be still more compared with 1903 and 1904. The bulk of the work on the principal projects of the Reclamation Service on which estimates were made during 1903 and 1904 was done in 1906 and later.

In addition to the increase in cost of labor during 1906–1908 there was so much construction work in progress throughout the country that it was very difficult to obtain laborers, and the efficiency of labor greatly decreased. I have been informed that in many cases it was only possible to secure the most transient labor. Knowing that they could get work anywhere this class of men did not care to hold a permanent job. A construction company that has a continuous organization did not feel the effects of this inefficiency so much, but all temporary construction work requiring the labor of men for a short time in one place had great difficulty in retaining men, and for trivial reasons the men would often quit in a body and greatly embarrass the work. In the reclamation work a number of cases could be cited where carloads of laborers were shipped from Chicago, the home of these gentlemen who are now opposing us, or eastern points—New York City, for instance—by the railroads for the Reclamation Service, and they all deserted before they got to the site of the work. These difficulties not only greatly hampered the work of the service, but so reduced the efficiency as to add greatly to its cost. In many cases the depreciation in efficiency of the laborers resulted in from 25 to 30 per cent of additional cost.

There were also increases in the costs of some of the principal construction materials during the years 1906, 1907, and 1908 over the costs during 1903 and 1904, which tended to increase the actual costs appreciably over the estimated costs.

There is another element that enters into the cost of construction work on an irrigation project and that quite generally causes an increase of cost. This is the rise in the price of forage and grain used for animals employed and the cost of animals themselves. In the majority of cases the price of hay and grain was doubled during the construction period following the dates in which the estimates of the projects were made. A similar increase in the cost of horses and mules existed. These rises in prices of feed and work animals are generally due to the sudden increased demand for these products beyond the capacity of the local supplies.

The underestimating of the cost of engineering works is not peculiar to the Reclamation Service. A similar condition exists in the construction of private irrigation works. It is well known that railway work, private irrigation work, and work on the Panama Canal were all being done at from 60 to 75 per cent in excess of what the cost was, or would have been, estimated in 1904 or 1905.

The president of the Northern Pacific Railway states that the average cost of work prosecuted by that company since 1905 has been found by careful estimate to average about 60 per cent above the cost of the five years preceding that date. Mr. Andrew J. Wiley, Boise, Idaho, who has probably the widest experience with irrigation work under private enterprise and the provisions of the Carey Act during the last 10 years, states that his experience indicates the average cost since 1905 to be about 75 per cent more than the cost for the five years preceding that date. This testimony is borne out by the experience of all those engaged in construction work in the West as well, also, as in a less degree in other regions.

The estimated cost of the Panama Canal was $149,000,000, and the cost to date is about $400,000,000, showing increase of about 170 per cent. The canal is not yet completed, either. A portion of this is due to changes and extensions in plans as in the reclamation work and the remainder to the increased cost of labor.

It would appear, therefore, that the underestimation of cost of the work of the Reclamation Service is due principally to the increasing of the amount of work that was contemplated would be done on the projects, to an increased cost in labor between the time of making the estimate and the doing of the bulk of the work on the projects, to a similar but less increased cost of construction materials entering into the works during their construction, and to high prices for feed for stock used in the works. Such underestimation of costs can not therefore properly be adduced as an argument against the Federal Government engaged in large construction work.

The great difficulty in making comparison between private and Government work in the irrigation business is due to the fact that there is a multiplicity of conditions surrounding each project affecting the cost thereof that are not always considered when the comparisons are made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "three" in the last line and insert "one," so that the amendment as amended will read: "At the rate of 1 per cent per annum."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVY. I call up my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York calls up his amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "three" on the last line and inserting "four."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "three" and inserting a zero.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GORDON. Such an amendment as that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order if the gentleman desires to make it. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman write in there the word "zero"?

Mr. BRYAN. I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 55.

Mr. COX. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. Cox and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 16, by inserting, after the word "established," the following: "In addition to the principal of the construction charge there shall be paid in each case annual interest upon the balance of the construction charge remaining unpaid at the rate of 2 per cent per annum."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. I make the point of order that that amendment is out of order, we having just refused to make a 3 per cent amendment and a 1 per cent amendment, and we can not now amend on the same identical point. The action of the House is conclusive.

Mr. MANN. This is new Progressive parliamentary law. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the debate on this amendment was closed and that all amendments were to be offered and voted on.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That was the unanimous-consent request as to all amendments but this one.

Mr. MANN. That was not the request at all. It was on all amendments and amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the request put to the Chair on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] and all amendments thereto—that the debate should close in one hour.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. It does not need to be renewed, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] argued with the Chair almost a day in trying to get an amendment changed after it was acted upon by the House, and the present Speaker, Mr. CLARK, ruled it out of order on the ground that we could not again take up the same subject matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the gentleman, of course.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], who was so completely nonplussed by a temporary victory in the House, has reversed his ideas, and thinks that an amendment was just agreed to and can not be changed, and, with a learning that is worthy of great hearing, he has argued to the Chair that where the House has agreed to an amendment it can not change it. The gentleman imagines that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the Chair has ruled that the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that the amendment is in order.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. We have a lot of other amendments.

Mr. GARNER. What other amendments have you got? I will ask, Mr. Chairman, that on this particular amendment the debate close in 10 minutes. This matter has been discussed all afternoon. Let us try to get along with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] objects.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we are confronted with this proposition: The Government is expending $200,000,000 for the development of arid lands. The question arises whether or not this Congress will decide that we ought to enter upon the expenditure of that money. If we agree in advance that the projects are unprofitable, surely we can not justify the expenditure of $200,000,000 without some interest charge to those who get the benefit of that money.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How does the gentleman get his $200,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I have stated that in detail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. There has been and is now a sentiment all over the Nation in favor of rural credit legislation, and I would like to ask the gentlemen on this floor how you are going to justify the refusal to enact rural credit legislation for the farmers of the United States in the face of the expenditure of this $200,000,000 for the development of the arid lands of the West without the payment of a single dollar of interest? If you establish this precedent now, you will be confronted with it when the rural credit legislation comes up for consideration before you. When the farmers of America demand of you equal treatment with those who live on the arid lands what can you say to them? What can you say to them when they confront you with the proposition that they want money out of the Public Treasury without the payment of interest when you have already decided to grant to those men who live on farms in the Western States $200,000,000 for the development of their lands without the payment of a single dollar of interest? The Government of the United States issues its bonds, with the circulation privilege, at 2 per cent interest, but no Government bond has ever been issued at that interest rate without the circulation privilege. Why, then, grant the privilege to settlers on arid lands the use of public money payable in 20 years without any interest whatsoever?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well now, that will not work.

Mr. GARNER. I think this paragraph has been discussed the entire afternoon.

Mr. MANN. I notify the gentleman now that we had an understanding that there should be liberal debate on this, and there are some other amendments to this paragraph, and no one will make anything, so far as time is concerned, by breaking faith by a motion like this.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman understands that I have no desire to cut off debate.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the gentleman is coming in for. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is in charge of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. We have discussed this matter for hours; and I asked unanimous consent that the debate close in 10 minutes, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] objected.

Mr. MANN. Nobody is objecting to closing debate on this amendment.

Mr. GARNER. But objection was made.

Mr. MANN. Why should the gentleman from Texas make such a motion? The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is in charge of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman from Illinois in charge of it on that side?

Mr. MANN. No; I am not in charge of it on either side, nor do I ever make such a motion as this, butting in, either.

Mr. GARNER. Why did the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] object? Is he in charge of the bill?

Mr. MANN. He has a right to object.

Mr. GARNER. I move that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. There will be no more business done in this House at any time without a quorum if this motion prevails.

Mr. GARNER. Of course the gentleman from Illinois can make his bluff.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman can call the bluff by going ahead and forcing the motion.

Mr. GARNER. I ask that the debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent, or make the motion?

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know if it is going to be in order, after this amendment is voted on, for somebody else to move 1½ per cent, and then 5 per cent, and then 6 per cent, and then 8 per cent, or any other amount, and keep it up indefinitely?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to answer that question when we come to it. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take any time on this bill, but I do want to make a suggestion to the committee, and that is that we have had this one particular paragraph and this one particular question under discussion for the entire afternoon, and it does seem to me that there ought to be some limit somewhere when we can wind up this bill at some time.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. I always yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. What need is there of hurry as to the business of the House? We are literally doing next to nothing, and liable to be doing that same thing until next December. Why does the gentleman get so impatient, and why is he in such a hurry to close debate?

Mr. LEVY. I will tell the gentleman why.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order. If we are to expedite business, let us expedite it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman from Texas asked unanimous consent to close debate at once.

Mr. GARNER. I did not; I asked to close debate in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Why not close it at once? You are wasting time.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois wastes fifty minutes where I waste one.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not waste it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. GARNER. If the Chair does not care for me to address my remarks to the gentleman from Illinois, I will not do so. I want to call the attention of the committee, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, to the fact that we have been on this one paragraph the entire afternoon, and while the gentleman from Illinois has enlightened the committee on the proposition, it is evident that his purpose is to inject all the politics into it he can, and at the same time do all the injury he can to the dry farmers of the West.

Mr. MANN. That is not true; it is a false statement.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois will sit in his seat and violate the rules as he usually does.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order.

Mr. GARNER. Unless the gentleman from Illinois can have the courtesy to get up and address the Chair and ask to be recognized——

Mr. MANN. Which I did not do.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois seldom does; he is always invoking the rule, but violates it more than any Member on the floor.

Mr. MANN. I can take care of myself, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois is always agreeable if you let him have his way. Unfortunately under the rules governing the House he will have his way or take up the entire session to accomplish what he wants to accomplish. Often in the committee and in the House the gentleman from Illinois says that unless you agree to my whim I will make the point of no quorum and have the roll called.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not talking to his motion to expedite business.

Mr. GARNER. I hope the gentleman will content himself for a moment. I was discussing the amendment in connection with the fact that we have been considering the entire afternoon, and expressing the hope that I could with the aid of the gentleman from Illinois get through with the business.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota rose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I know that the gentleman from Texas desires to expedite the bill, and will he not make a motion to close debate in five minutes?

Mr. GARNER. I have asked unanimous consent to close debate in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman has wasted the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment by unanimous consent was to close in five minutes, and the gentleman from Texas has used a part of it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas got the consent of the House to close debate in five minutes. I am entirely willing to have a vote now on this amendment. He has consumed the time, now let us vote.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by making it 2½ per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to amend the amendment by striking out the word "two" and inserting the words "two and a half." The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 50 ayes and 63 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 3, by striking out all after the word "installment" down to the end of line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and shall pay the balance of the principal of said construction charge in 20 annual installments, the first 5 of which shall each be 3 per cent of the construction charge, the next 10 installments shall each be 5 per cent, and the remaining 5 installments shall each be 6 per cent until the whole amount shall have been paid."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this amendment provides much easier terms of payment than the original bill does, and if the gentlemen who are in favor of this irrigation proposition want to help the settlers, they should vote for this amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I want to say that the officials of the Reclamation Service and the Interior Department, and the Irrigation Committees of both the Senate and the House, and nearly all the Members of the Senate and House from the West, as well as the representatives of all of these 32 reclamation projects, have been at work on this bill for a year or more and have exhaustively considered every line of it, and we are confident that this is the fairest and most practical and best way of making these payments, both for the Government and the settlers under these projects, and I hope this system will be retained in the bill, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 2, by striking out all after the word "two" down to the end of line 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "5 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of the principal of said charge in 35 annual installments, the first 10 of which shall each be 2 per cent of the construction charge and the remaining 25 shall each be 3 per cent, until the whole amount shall have been paid. In addition to the principal of the construction charge there shall be paid in each case, annually, interest upon the balance of the construction charge remaining unpaid from time to time at the rate of 3 per cent per annum."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment gives to the people who live on these irrigation projects 35 years in which to make payments. Each annual payment is so small that it can not involve any hardship whatever to the settler. The chairman of the committee says that he and others have given six months' time to the consideration of this bill; that they have decided upon just exactly what is to be done; that they have reached a conclusion that is most beneficial to the settlers on the arid lands of the West; and they are in favor of imposing burdens upon the arid-land settlers that this amendment does not impose. They want him to make his payments within 20 years, and I am willing to give him 35 years in which to make his payments. If you want to help the settler on the arid western land, you will vote for the adoption of this amendment, because it proposes to lighten his burdens; it proposes to give him time in which to make his payments, and makes the payments so light that nobody can complain.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment. Under the existing law the payments are all to be made within 10 years' time. Under the bill which is now pending on entries hereafter made the entryman pays 5 per cent at the beginning and pays nothing more until 5 years, and then pays the balance in different amounts in 15 years, making the whole amount payable within 20 years' time. The amendment which has been offered by my colleague makes no change except to extend the time from 20 years to 40 years, and provides for an interest charge of 3 per cent. It would still leave no payment of the principal of the construction charge for 5 years, except the initial payment of 5 per cent, and would in no case require the payment for principal and interest combined to be more than 5 per cent per annum upon the amount invested. How can gentlemen object to that? They would only be required under this amendment to pay 2 per cent of the construction charge during the second 5 years. It would amount to a total of 10 per cent of the construction charge after the initial payment during the first 10 years. How can gentlemen have the nerve, when they borrow money from the Federal Treasury, not to be willing to pay for principal and interest 5 per cent a year and thereby pay off the principal? Gentlemen are now sowing the wind, but they will reap the whirlwind. Those in these arid regions will find that a Congress hereafter will some time say, "You have gone too far," and they will pull back, and gentlemen from the other portions of the country who go home this summer and say, "There has been no rural credit bill passed under which you farmers can obtain any help, with the payment of interest, yet I voted for a bill to give to other farmers money without interest, and even refused to vote for a proposition which would retire both the principal and the interest in 40 years' time, with no payment in any year exceeding 5 per cent of the loan," will reap the whirlwind next fall.

The gentlemen ought to be willing to accept it, but they have had their hand in the Treasury so easy that they are unwilling to withdraw it unless it is filled with money. I wish gentlemen were willing to accept a reasonable proposition. Wherever the Government, as it has in some places in the world, has undertaken to help the farmers by the advancement of money, it never has made a proposition more generous to the farmers than the one from my colleague now pending.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. For a question.

Mr. BRYAN. I have before me a report on the speech of Mr. Elwood Meade on reclamation projects in Australia, which entirely contradicts the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MANN. What is it about?

Mr. BRYAN. It is about reclamation.

Mr. MANN. Does it relate to this subject?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. That is rather unusual——

Mr. BRYAN. And in addition to furnishing water and what has been done in this country, they make a cash loan of 60 per cent of the settlers' improvements in Australia, and they have more liberal privileges in Canada.

Mr. MANN. They loan that 60 per cent at interest.

Mr. BRYAN. They do not charge——

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman has nerve to offer that as a precedent for loaning them 100 per cent without interest. Great God!

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman is mistaken; they charge nothing on the work, but interest on the loan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask to be recognized.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under the five-minute rule there can only be one speech for and one against the proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. No one has been recognized against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we have all of us long since been warned to beware of the Greeks bearing gifts. [Applause.] It is always safe to vote against an amendment offered by the enemy of a proposition. The gentleman from Illinois, who offered this amendment, would be happy if there was an interest charge and has voted for interest amendments. Here is an amendment now that no man can justify, because of the fact that it extends the period of payment to 35 years and lays a heavy burden of interest——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Whereas no settler on any reclamation project, no dweller in the country where the reclamation projects are being undertaken, no one having to do with reclamation projects has ever asked for any extension beyond 20 years, and I prefer to take the period which the friends of the measure have decided is fair and equitable rather than this proposed by the enemy.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is not all debate exhausted on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I have had long experience in listing and selling farm lands. I have acquired a knowledge of conditions in the arid regions from personal experience. I know perfectly well that what the settler needs to make good is time to pay for his land out of its product. He does not need to be coddled, and he does not need to get along without the payment of interest, which he always pays under every private contract. What he needs is time to work out his own salvation. I have sold a great deal of land, and I have never taken back one acre from any settler. I have always realized that when he has met with adversity, then I ought to give him a chance by extending his time and not by curtailing a low interest charge.

The same thing must be true and will be proven true in Government ownership and Government transfers. I can not see why we should further subsidize the settlement of arid Government lands. We ought possibly, under our homestead policy, freely to give the land, but when through Government help we put water upon the land and make it productive when it was not productive, then it is but fair that we should ask the man who goes upon that land to make good the improvement charge, principal and interest.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENT. No; I shall not yield. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has put in an amendment that is eminently reasonable. It provides long, patient waiting of 35 years on the part of the Government, with payment of an extremely low rate of interest at 3 per cent. If we here and now abolish the idea of the Government charging interest on improvements put on land, I can not see how we can ever possibly face the proposition of granting or aiding rural credit without giving to all applicants the same privilege of money without interest that we give to these people on irrigation projects. And therefore, in the interest of the people whom I know, in the interest of my own district and all other agricultural districts, I believe that the granting of this long, long period is to their advantage, and I believe the Government will not be the loser, provided it make an interest charge. But if the Government here and now starts in to lend money for improvement of property without charging interest, we might just as well take upon ourselves every crazy scheme that Coxey or any other fiatist ever urged, and go to it to an insolvent finish. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a great mistake that the friends of this bill do not agree upon a fair rate of interest. It will be construed wrongfully, and you must take into consideration the financial situation of the country. It is not very easy at the present time to sell any 2 per cent bonds or 3 per cent bonds. The English Government receives 3 per cent for their land sales and purchases in Ireland. At the present time the securities of this country are selling on the basis of 8 and 10 per cent, and if you go on in the manner that you propose, expending $200,000,000, how do you propose to keep the credit of the United States Government up to par? It is a great mistake. You should at least make it 3 or 4 per cent. I am quite sure that even the people in the section who ask for this extension will agree to it, because in that portion of the country money is demanding 8 to 10 per cent per annum. In Canada the railroads, in making improvements, receive 4 or 5 per cent for money on irrigation lands.

I hope the friends of this bill will reconsider it and come to the conclusion that we ought to charge some rate of interest. Otherwise this bill will be a failure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 57.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado and Mr. MADDEN took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ACT SHALL APPLY TO EXISTING PROJECTS.

SEC. 2. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the terms and conditions of the reclamation law shall pay the construction charge, or the portion of the construction charge remaining unpaid, in 20 annual installments, the first of which shall become due and payable on December 1 of the year in which the public notice affecting his land is issued under this act, and subsequent installments on December 1 of each year thereafter. The first 4 of such installments shall each be 2 per cent, the next 2 installments shall each be 4 per cent, and the next 14 each 6 per cent of the total construction charge.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "charge," insert "or the portion of the construction charge unpaid at the beginning of such installments."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the terms and conditions of the reclamation law shall pay the principal of the construction charge, or the portion of the principal of the construction charge remaining unpaid, in 40 annual installments, the first of which shall become due and payable on December 1 of the year in which the public notice affecting his land is issued under this act, and subsequent installments on December 1 of each year thereafter. The first 10 of such installments shall each be 1 per cent and the remaining 30 installments shall each be 3 per cent of the total construction charge, or the portion of the construction charge unpaid at the beginning of such installments: Provided, That in addition to the principal of the construction charge there shall be paid in each case, annually, interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon such portion of the balance of the construction charge as remains unpaid beyond the time or times fixed for the payment thereof under the reclamation law in force when such land or entry became subject to the terms and conditions of such reclamation law: Provided further, That such person may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charge owing by him prior to the time herein required."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARNER. Let us get through with this section and start in with the next section.

Mr. MADDEN. All right. I will withdraw my point.

Mr. MANN. We have just finished the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENALTIES.

SEC. 3. That if any water-right applicant or entryman shall fail to pay any installment of his construction charges when due, there shall be added to the amount unpaid a penalty of 1 per cent thereof, and there shall be added a like penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid on the first day of each month thereafter so long as such default shall continue. If any such applicant or entryman shall be one year in default in the payment of any installment of the construction charges and penalties, or any part thereof, his water-right application, and if he be a homestead entryman, his entry also shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund, but no homestead entry shall be subject to contest because of such default: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall so elect, he may cause suit or action to be brought for the recovery of the amount in default and penalties; but if suit or action be brought, the right to declare a cancellation and forfeiture shall be suspended pending such suit or action.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] objects to all these requests.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, July 23, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Mass meeting of citizens petition Congress to submit amendment prohibiting importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors. Over a hundred thousand names were signed to the initiative petition in this State—evidence that the majority of the people you represent favor this amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I present a memorial, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The memorial was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

To the Members of the honorable body of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your petitioners respectfully represent and present the hereinafter described petition and resolution, to wit:

That whereas we, St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Brotherhood, of the city of Helena, on the 8th day of June, 1914, duly and unanimously passed a resolution indorsing the full text of the prohibition resolution and petition delivered to Congress by the Anti-Saloon League committee of one thousand, at Washington, December 10, 1913.

That we recognize that the saloon is highly injurious and debauching to American citizenship; that the ruin caused by war, famine, and pestilence is a vanishing factor as compared with the deluge of damnation wrought every 365 days of every year in the past and present centuries.

That we recognize and realize the oncoming and irresistible avalanche of the prohibition wave under the awakening pulse of a public conscience, similar to that sentiment of 1865 which would accept no defeat for abolition of human slavery; that we recognize and realize, in view of the rapidly increasing prohibition sentiment in the State of Montana and in all other States, that the sagacious, longheaded, and wise politician—observing the liquor "handwriting on the wall"—acts prudently by henceforth allying himself with the dominant sober and better elements in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, And your petitioners pray, that said petition and resolution as proposed, praying for a constitutional prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be passed by both Chambers of Congress when same is presented for your respectful consideration. We reaffirm our belief in the speedy overthrow and dethronement of King Alcohol and sincerely wish for a saloonless nation in 1920.

E. H. GUNDERSON,
Dean of Helena Law College.
H. A. DAVEE,
President.
O. B. TOMLIN,
Acting Secretary of Brotherhood.

RADIUM-BEARING ORES.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, lest we forget that the radium bill is still clamoring for recognition before this body, I send a petition to the desk and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATE BILL (S. 4405) TO ENCOURAGE RADIUM INDUSTRY.

NATURITA, COLO., June 1, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Mines and Mining,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Inasmuch as this bill, as reported by you from the Committee on Mines and Mining to the United States Senate on March 16, 1914, supplies a free, competitive market for carnotite ore, continues the application of the general laws in relation to mining lands except in unimportant details, and insures the development of the carnotite mining business under conditions highly favorable to persons having only limited amount of capital, we, the undersigned, who are engaged in the carnotite business, do hereby petition you to do everything that lies in your power to have the said bill passed by the Senate at the earliest possible moment.

A. R. RADER
(And others),
Bedrock, Colo.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the Senate will be interested in knowing the progress that has been made in connection with the interesting experiments being conducted by the Bureau of Mines at the reduction works in the city of Denver in the extraction of radium from carnotite ore. Accordingly, I send to the desk the following communication and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the request?

Mr. WALSH. It is a communication from Dr. Charles L. Parsons, which I have just sent to the desk.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, certainly; I do not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF MINES,
July 9, 1914.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary Department of the Interior.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In accordance with your verbal request, I take pleasure in giving you the results of my experience on my recent trip to the carnotite mining regions of Colorado.

It was my privilege to meet a number of mining men in Denver, Placerville, Redvale, Norwall, Naturita, Long Park, Paradox, Uranium, and other places, many of whom knowing that I was in that portion of the country sought me to ask for information as to how soon the Government would be prepared to purchase ores and enter into the active production of radium therefrom. Without a single exception, every independent miner and prospector was heartily in favor of the legislation now proposed in Congress, and expressed their sincere regret that they had been so seriously misled by early newspaper reports, which they understood to mean the actual withdrawal of lands.

Such men as Curran, Belisle, McCloud, Manning, and others, who were early misled, expressed their full approval of the proposals as now understood by them, and whether operating independent claims or connected with a company there was no opposition, so far as I was able to determine, except from those in control of the operations of the Standard Chemical Co.

Messrs. Kithil and Davis, employees of the Bureau of Mines, who are now in the Paradox region and who have covered a much greater portion of the field than it has been my lot to personally examine, reported to me that so far as they had been able to find out there is nothing but unanimous approval on the part of the miner and prospector of the proposed legislation.

In spite of the large number of prospectors who went into the field during the early part of the year, comparatively few new discoveries of importance have been made. This is quite in accord with my opinion expressed before the House committee, that new discoveries of ore would come slowly. While many hundreds of claims were staked, comparatively few have been shown to contain carnotite of commercial grade and quantity, and the carnotite situation appears to be controlled by some three or four companies. The chief control is in the hands of the Standard Chemical Co., of Pittsburgh.

In addition to the above, I can now definitely state that there remains no question as to the successful outcome of the plant operations of the National Radium Institute at Denver, now being carried on under a cooperative agreement by the technical staff of the Bureau of Mines. Some 30 tons of ore have already been worked up in the plant, and its operation has been proceeding with regularity and efficiency that exceeds even our somewhat sanguine expectations.

Yours, very respectfully, CHARLES L. PARSONS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, notwithstanding the papers that have been read, I have received a few petitions to the contrary, and I wish to put them in the RECORD at this time.

I wish to read what these petitioners say with relation to the radium bill:

We, the undersigned, prospectors, miners, teamsters, merchants, and other citizens of Montrose and San Miguel Counties, State of Colorado, do hereby emphatically deny that the sentiment as outlined in the letter of Mr. Charles F. Curran, under date of May 29, 1914, addressed to the Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH, chairman of the Mines and Mining Committee of the United States Senate, and the letter of Mr. Charles F. Curran, under date of May 29, 1914, addressed to the Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH, a member of the same committee, is representative of the views of the citizens of this district.

We are of the firm belief that individual miners and prospectors, together with private enterprise, will do more to develop the carnotite fields than can be done by the passage of Senate bill 4405, and that if the carnotite fields are permitted to remain as they are now they will be fully developed, and the results accruing therefrom will continue to very materially benefit our community.

We further believe that the contemplated legislation as outlined in Senate bill 4405 will prove a decided detriment to the mining and development of the carnotite industry instead of a benefit.

We therefore respectfully request that before final action is taken on this bill that you kindly give careful consideration to our petition.

That petition is signed by miners, whose signatures cover six or eight pages. Here is one signed by miners and citizens, whose signatures cover three or four pages. Here is another petition signed by three or four pages of miners. Then here is another signed by five or six pages of prospectors and miners. Another is signed by two pages of prospectors and miners, and another is signed by four pages of prospectors and miners.

Mr. President, as bearing on the radium bill which has been before the Senate, and to which the Senator from Montana has alluded several times in the morning hour, there is a dispatch from Berlin that ought to settle forever the proposition of enacting that bill into legislation. I desire to read it, so that it may go in as a part of my remarks:

GIVE UP USE OF RADIUM—GERMAN DOCTORS ABANDON IT IN CANCER CASES—TURN TO X-RAYS.

BERLIN, July 16, 1914.

Germany's greatest surgery specialists have abandoned the use of radium for the treatment of cancer, and are now confining themselves exclusively to the Röntgen rays.

Among them is Prof. Bumm, director of the women's clinic of the University of Berlin, who has just presented a number of women cured of cancer by the Röntgen method. The surgeon general of the German Army, Prof. Bier, who is also the head of the surgical faculty of the university here, is another who has renounced faith in radium.

The surgeons say patients are treated with apparent success by radium and discharged as either improved or cured, but shortly afterwards they reveal evidences of a return of the disease in other parts of the body.

The German doctors do not mean to assert that the Röntgen therapy is infallible. Positive success, on the contrary, is still remote, but they are satisfied that there is no longer any use in buying radium at exorbitant prices for cancer treatment.

I wish to call attention to a London dispatch of June 13 last, which states the results obtained at a London institute in 500 cases. It reads as follows:

FIFTY CURED BY RADIUM—INSTITUTE IN LONDON REPORTS UPON RESULTS OBTAINED IN 500 CASES.

LONDON, June 13, 1914.

Out of nearly 500 cases of malignant cancer treated by the Radium Institute during the year 1913, 50 are described in the annual report of the institute as apparently cured and 183 as "improved." In a number of cases the results are not yet noted.

The institute declines to treat operable cases, radium being used only as a last resort.

"Time only can show," the Lancet says, "if any of these satisfactory results are permanent, and not until some years have passed without fresh manifestations of the disease could even the most favorable cases be described as cured.

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a number of clippings consisting of the action of various surgical and medical societies of the United States and of Europe relative to the curative qualities of radium. At the present time the opinion of, I might say, nine-tenths of the surgical and medical associations is that it is dangerous to use radium, that in effect it drives the poison into the system and it produces death in many instances.

I wish to call attention to the fact that about two months ago in the city of New York there assembled the American Society for the Control of Cancer, and in that association there were some of the leading, if not most of the leading, surgeons of the entire United States, and at that meeting Dr. Mayo, the celebrated surgeon of Rochester, Minn., who has a line of practice which extends all over the world, reported that not one case out of a hundred treated by radium was ever cured.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand that this matter was up for discussion, but I interrupt the Senator to say that I have a telegram in my desk from Dr. Mayo denying that he ever made such a statement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have it here, if the Senator cares to see it.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to see it at some time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that is the case, we will find what further there is that I have here. I wish to put into the RECORD a statement taken from the Washington Post of April 11 last, which is as follows:

FIND NO RADIUM CURE—SURGEONS SAY ONLY THE KNIFE WILL ARREST CANCER.

NEW YORK, April 10.

All hope of curing cancer by radium has been abandoned by some of the foremost surgeons and research workers of the country, who declared at to-night's meeting of the American Society for the Control of Cancer that the failures of radium outnumbered the cures 100 to 1.

That nothing is of avail against this most dreaded disease but the speedy use of the knife was the opinion advanced by Dr. William H.

Mayo, of Rochester, Minn. Operation is the only cure, but radium or ray treatment is in order as a temporary palliative, where operation is impossible, according to Dr. Francis G. Wood, director of cancer research at Columbia University. Another generation will be required to furnish knowledge on the real cause and actual nature of cancer, he said. Experiments for 35 centuries show that heredity plays only a small part, if any, in its appearance.

HOLD OUT NO HOPE.

It was expected that the members of the society would have something hopeful to report of their investigations. Instead, they admitted no progress and held out little hope. They united in saying they had discovered neither the cause nor the nature of cancer. Then they proved by statistics that cancer is on the increase.

That a change in the habits and customs may reduce the disease to some extent was a ray of hope held out by Dr. Mayo, who also said any cancer could be cured if operated upon in its early stages.

"If we could only tell how to avoid it, I would be glad because I am frank to admit that we do not know," he declared. He said the statement that the use of meat was one of the habits to be avoided in connection with cancer prevention had been wrongly attributed to him.

Mr. President, the Senator in charge of the unfinished business states to me that he will have to call for the regular order if I continue reading these articles. I wish to inform the Senate that I have quite a number here that are to the same force and effect, and explode the idea that radium is a specific for the cure of cancer.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Has the Senator noticed the decline in the price of radium?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand it has declined from $120,000 to $80,000 a gram.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am glad to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will lie on the table, the bill having been reported.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes. Later on I shall file a report (No. 706) of the committee to accompany the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say that while I joined with the committee in the favorable report on the bill just reported by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], there are many things in it which I think are vicious and to which I am greatly opposed. At the proper time I shall state my objections more at length.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 5630) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Tex., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 707) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2692. A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell all unsold lots in the town site of Plummer, Kootenai County, Idaho, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 708); and

S. 5701. A bill providing for the disposal of certain lands in block 32 in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington (Rept. No. 709).

BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGE, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 17005) authorizing the fiscal court of Pike County, Ky., to construct a bridge across Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Williamson, W. Va., and I submit a report (No. 702) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] to the bill.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. BURTON. I did not understand over which fork of the Big Sandy River the bridge is to be constructed.

Mr. CAMDEN. Over the Tug Fork.

Mr. BURTON. I inquire what is the location of the proposed bridge and how far is it from the mouth of the Tug Fork?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the portion of the bill describing the location of the proposed bridge.

The Secretary read as follows:

At a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the town of Williamson, in the county of Mingo, in the State of West Virginia.

Mr. BURTON. How far is it from the mouth of the Tug Fork?

Mr. CAMDEN. I do not know the exact distance.

Mr. BURTON. Is it above or below the lock and dam on that fork?

Mr. CAMDEN. It is above it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, one question. I gather from the reading of the bill that it authorizes the construction by a county in Kentucky of a bridge over waters in West Virginia.

Mr. CAMDEN. The river separates the two States; it constitutes the boundary line.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES, WASHINGTON.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4146) granting certain lands to school district No. 44, Chelan County, Wash., and I submit a report (No. 705) thereon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this bill provides for transferring a small tract of land to a school district in my State. It is a short bill, and I am satisfied will lead to no discussion. Therefore I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to school district No. 44, Chelan County, State of Washington, 1.77 acres in lot 3, section 13, township 27 north, range 16 east, Willamette meridian, more particularly described as follows: Beginning at the corner No. 1 of the tract of land to be described, which is a stone marked "S. ST. JOHN RIVER BRIDGE, MAINE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 16579) to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. John River at Fort Kent, Me., and I submit a report (No. 703) thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It merely authorizes the construction of a bridge at Fort Kent, Me. It is a House bill, and I think it will take but a moment to dispose of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is temporarily absent, is the introducer of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANALYSIS OF TRUST BILLS.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in the course of some remarks made by me a few days ago on trust legislation I submitted an analysis or synopsis of the provisions of the three trust bills—two of them as they came over from the other House. Those two bills were then being considered by Senate committees. I also stated that when the changes were made I would notice the fact. There have been some changes made in those bills, some of which I think are quite important. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a revised synopsis or analysis of the bills as they are now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

[1] Through traffic passing two or more sections of the river is included in each section; and the sum of the traffic of the four sections would involve a considerable amount of duplication. On coal, also on oil, in the section below Vicksburg, there was a considerable increase in the traffic in 1912 over 1910.

Equally marked is the tendency toward the abandonment of through traffic and the limitation of traffic on rivers, even those of very considerable size and length to short hauls. It will be noticed that on the Great Lakes the average haul of freight carried through St. Marys River Canal between Lakes Superior and Huron is between 800 and 850 miles. This has been the average haul of this traffic for more than 25 years. Incidentally it may be remarked that the freight charges per ton per mile have very materially diminished and are perhaps the lowest in the world. On the other hand, the average haul on rivers, for which statistics are available, is in many instances below 50 miles and rarely, except in cases of the traffic heretofore mentioned, that in coal and logs, the former of which is carried advantageously in high stages of water in fleets of rafts, is it more than 100 miles.

The following table illustrates the tendency named, for some instances the haul of logs is very short:

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS FOR JUNE, 1914.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may take about five minutes of the time of the Senate to make a statement as to the imports and exports of merchandise during the month of June, 1914.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what the Senator is going to state will call for a reply. Once before we had some discussion of similar matters which resulted in consuming an hour or more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I would have almost been through with the statement by this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator is going to make a statement, I shall probably want to make a further statement in reply. I object to the request for unanimous consent, because I think we wish to go on with other legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, Mr. President; I shall make the statement at another time during the day.

NOMINATION OF THOMAS D. JONES.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the publication in the RECORD of the statement of Mr. Thomas D. Jones, dated July 18, 1914, which is a statement of fact and a correction of his testimony in some particulars. The former testimony of Mr. Jones was printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent. This is a continuation of his testimony and is equally entitled to be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to the printing of the statement asked for, but inasmuch as it is in part a reply to the report of a majority of the committee, I ask that the majority report be first printed in the RECORD; that it be followed by the statement of Mr. Jones; then, in turn, be followed by the report of the minority; and that the majority of the committee be given the right to have printed in the RECORD, as soon as it is prepared, such supplemental statement in reply to Mr. Jones as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that he already has unanimous consent. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked it on yesterday, and it was granted.

Mr. REED. That was that the testimony should be made public; it was not requested that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. I was under a misapprehension.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I would like to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that it is hardly appropriate to ask for the publication of reports that have not yet been submitted, and whose volume and relevancy can in no sense be passed upon. Here are two legitimate and limited propositions, namely, that the report of the majority be printed—that seems to be entirely proper—and that the statement of this witness, which is a limited statement compiled by him in a very short time—he was allowed from noon on Saturday to noon on Monday to prepare it and send it by mail—also be printed. The minority report when it comes can then be acted upon. I take it these two propositions are already before the Senate, namely, the report of the majority and the statement of the witness, which supplies important facts. I think the Senate ought to act on those two propositions which are before the Senate. I do not believe it is proper to ask unanimous consent for unlimited printing until the papers referred to are prepared and submitted. I do not at this time ask for the printing of the minority report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that the propositions be separated and that they be acted upon one at a time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it was the Senator himself who proffered the request primarily that the report of the minority be made public. That was before the report of the minority had been made; indeed, it has not yet been made, to my knowledge.

It seems to me, therefore, a little peculiar that the Senator should now object to printing in the RECORD the same thing which he asked to have made public or to the printing in the RECORD a reply to that. I shall not object to this request if it is coupled with the other statement; and it should be, because Mr. Jones has very seriously reflected upon the intelligence, if not upon the integrity, of the majority of the committee. His language is extremely offensive, and was undoubtedly purposely employed.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I will say that personally I have no objection, but I think these propositions should be acted upon separately—namely, that the statement of the witness should be first considered. I ask leave to have that printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object unless it is coupled with the qualifications which I have already stated, so that the whole matter may go together.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object to an agreement to print something in the RECORD which has not been submitted to us. I do not think I shall object when it is submitted, but I do not think we ought to establish the precedent of agreeing to print matter in the RECORD that has never been submitted at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, the whole matter can lie over until everything is ready.

Mr. LEE of Maryland subsequently said: Mr. President, I accept the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that the report of the majority of the committee be printed in the RECORD, followed by the statement of Mr. Jones of July 18, 1914, the individual minority report, the subsequent minority report, and the rejoinder of the majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] made objection to the printing of this matter in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. I made objection to agreeing to print in the RECORD in advance something that has never been submitted to the Senate. That was the extent of my objection.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Georgia has no objection, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted to print in the RECORD the matter indicated.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Executive Report No. 1. Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

NOMINATION OF THOMAS D. JONES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following adverse report, to accompany the nomination of Thomas D. Jones to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board:

The Committee on Banking and Currency herewith reports to the Senate the appointment of Mr. Thomas D. Jones, nominated to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and recommends that the Senate decline to advise and consent to the same.

This recommendation is based on the fact that Mr. Jones is an active director in the Harvester Trust and one of the founders and directors of the Zinc Trust. The first has been judicially declared to be an unlawful conspiracy in several States and is now being prosecuted by the United States. The latter has established a practical monopoly in oxide of zinc, has raised the price of the same to consumers, and on a capital of $10,000,000 is making an unconscionable profit of $5,000,000 a year.

THE HARVESTER TRUST.

The Harvester Trust was organized in 1902 under the name of the International Harvester Co., with a capital of $120,000,000. It was formed and financed by J. P. Morgan & Co., which took in four harvester companies, known as the McCormick, Deering, Champion, and Plano concerns. These four concerns received $103,144,660.98 in stock, or 86 per cent of the whole issue. The McCormick interests received $51,148,704.13, or 42.6 per cent; the Deering interests $41,280,167.85, or 34.4 per cent. Nine per cent of the stock went to the other two concerns. J. P. Morgan & Co. received as a commission for forming the trust over $3,000,000 in stock, and they also received $3,000,000 in stock in payment for a fifth concern, the Milwaukee Harvester Co., which they had purchased, thus making $6,000,000 of the stock which was turned over to J. P. Morgan & Co. Ten million dollars of the stock was sold for cash to Rockefeller and others through the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Second. The effect of the organization of the trust was to do away with competition between the five great harvester companies, which were doing about 85 per cent of the business of the United States.

Third. All of the stock received by the four harvester companies in payment for their plants was under a trust agreement at once deposited with J. P. Morgan & Co., and the power to vote it placed in the hands of three men, to wit, Mr. Perkins, of the firm of Morgan & Co.; Mr. McCormick, and Mr. Deering. This was to continue for 5 years, and was made renewable for another 5 years, and did, as a matter of fact, continue for 10 years, until 1912, when the Federal Government began proceedings against the trust.

Fourth. Those who were thus required to deposit their stock with the voting trustees received stock certificates, but they were required to agree not to sell these certificates except in limited amounts over a period of years, and in order to guarantee their fulfillment of this contract they were also required to deposit their trust certificates with J. P. Morgan & Co. Thus the full control over 85 or 90 per cent of the harvester business of the country was placed for 10 years in the hands of three men, and the power of constituent companies to part with their holdings or realize money on them was limited and circumscribed.

Fifth. All directors of the harvester company from 1902 to 1912 were elected by the votes of the three trustees above named, and among those thus elected was Mr. Thomas D. Jones, in April, 1909.

Sixth. Mr. Jones was not financially interested in the company, but purchased a share of stock for $100 cash in order to qualify himself as a director. In a sense, therefore, he was and is what is known as a dummy director.

Seventh. It has been said in behalf of Mr. Jones that he became a director for the purpose of reforming the company, but Mr. Jones's testimony is unqualified and in repeated statements shows that he became a director to please his lifelong friend, Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick, the largest owner in the trust and the chief beneficiary of the trust. Furthermore, Mr. Jones states that since he became a director he has participated in and agreed to all important decisions concerning the policy of the trust; that he is in entire accord with the other directors; that he has at no time made any effort to modify the policy of the trust or lead it to conform to the law of the United States or of the various States. He stands, therefore, in no different relation to the trust than other directors, and Mr. McCormick or Mr. Perkins himself would be just as eligible for a position upon the Federal Reserve Board as Mr. Jones.

Eighth. Against the claim that Mr. Jones's position as a director was merely nominal, and that he did not participate in the responsibility for the policy and unlawful practices of the company during recent years, may be taken his statement, on page 8 of the hearings, that he took an active interest as a director; that the meetings were held every two weeks; that in five years he has only missed two or three of those held in Chicago and a few of those occasionally held in New York. He specifically stated that he was present when the $20,000,000 stock dividend was declared and supported the proposition. When the company was prosecuted as a trust, he examined the pleadings and briefs in the case and approved the action taken by the trust's attorneys, and he has approved and participated in the stand of his company in resisting the prosecution by the Government of the United States; that he approves the swollen capital of the company and the great increase of its earnings in recent years, which have resulted from the formation and operation of the trust in recent years while he has been a director.

Ninth. The harvester company is of all the American trusts probably the most obnoxious and notorious. Starting with five or six established brands of harvesting machinery, which previous to that time had been sold in competition with each other, it united them into one ownership, and then enlarged its activities so as to take in other agricultural machinery, such as cream separators, binding twine, and manure spreaders, not originally manufactured by the constituent companies. In this way it rapidly acquired a control of the market in those lines also.

It threw over 12,000 traveling men and office men out of employment. It increased the selling price of its products. It secretly bought out so-called independent harvester companies, but continued to operate them under the pretense that they were independent. It did this to destroy competition that was really independent and to deceive the retail trade and the consumer. In some cases its secret subsidiaries, pretending to act as independent companies, sent out inflammatory advertising, denouncing the harvester company, for the purpose of deceiving the retail dealers and crowding out the products of companies which were really independent. Sometimes it crushed an independent competitor by destroying its credit, as in the case of the Osborn Harvester Works, whose large loans were suddenly called and which was compelled to sell to the trust to escape bankruptcy, after which for several years the trust operated the Osborn Harvester Works as a blind or stool pigeon of so-called independent manufacturers. It established several thousand agencies throughout the United States, and, not content with the natural monopoly which resulted from its control of the leading brands of harvesting machinery, it bound them by contract to handle nothing but its trust-made goods.

Tenth. The policy of the company in crushing competition by unfair methods, dismissing employees, increasing prices, has resulted in an enormous increase in the profits of the trust. Starting with a profit of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 a year, the trust has increased its profits year by year, so that they were $10,000,000 in 1908 and $16,000,000 in 1911, as shown by the report of the Bureau of Corporations.

Eleventh. The Bureau of Corporations in its report a year ago recited seven objectionable competitive methods adopted by the trust to destroy competition and interviewed 800 retail dealers in 600 towns concerning the same. More than 400 condemned the practices of the company as unfair and only 200 spoke well of the company, although doing business with it.

Twelfth. Many State legislatures have denounced this trust and many State courts have convicted and punished, or attempted to punish, it for violating State laws, including Kansas, Texas, Missouri, Ohio, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Montana. Most of these prosecutions have occurred while Mr. Jones has been a director.

Thirteenth. In response to nation-wide complaints against this trust, its officers and directors, the United States Government brought action against it in the summer of 1912 and named as one of the defendants in the case Mr. Thomas D. Jones. The charges made by authority of the United States against the trust involved not only the violation of law in the original formation of the trust, but the continued violation and defiance of law with the purpose of enlarging the scope of business so as to create a complete monopoly of agricultural implements. This policy and these acts covered the time Mr. Jones has been a director. He fully approves all acts done recently. See page 36 of his testimony. Mr. Jones agrees with and accepts part responsibility for the attitude of the trust in resisting and defying the United States, as it has also resisted and defied the various States.

Fourteenth. About the time the United States action was brought the trust divorced its foreign business from that in the United States by creating a separate concern, known as the International Harvester Corporation, and diverted about half of its great capital to that corporation, so that it might be beyond the reach of the United States in case the Government wins the action now pending. Mr. Jones participated in this act of evasion, as he did in earlier acts of defiance.

Fifteenth. Should the Government be successful in its suit, the Harvester Trust will be declared an outlaw, and whether its directors are or are not subjected to criminal prosecution, it is not thinkable that any of them could be permitted to hold a position of trust and honor under the Government. It is hardly less conceivable that a government should install in high office a man whom it is now prosecuting for violation of law.

THE ZINC TRUST.

Mr. Jones was one of those who in 1897 took part in the consolidation of the oxide of zinc interests of the United States into a company with $10,000,000 capital stock and $3,000,000 bonds. This company enjoys a practical monopoly in the United States. It makes about 85 to 90 per cent of the zinc oxide used in mixing paints. The rest is made by the Sherwin & Williams Paint Co. for their own use as paint manufacturers.

The company owns practically all of the known zinc ore in the United States, its chief mines being in New Jersey and Wisconsin. The only zinc ore not owned by the company in this country belongs to the Sherwin-Williams Co.

Prior to 1897 Mr. Jones and his brother owned the Wisconsin mines, and their company was capitalized at $400,000. In that year they formed their consolidation with the New Jersey Zinc Co., which had a capital of $4,000,000. This was now increased to $10,000,000, and the Jones company received $900,000 of it for their share in the combination. Some other smaller companies were also purchased. After the consolidation, profits increased year by year. Two years ago the company raised the price of zinc oxide. It then was able to declare a dividend of $4,000,000 on $10,000,000 capital. Last year it paid $5,000,000 in dividends on a capital of $10,000,000.

This company has not been prosecuted as a trust, but the union of competing companies into a single concern, the monopoly enjoyed, the control of prices, the raising of the same, and the payment of enormous dividends of 40 and 50 per cent a year on an inflated capital, present all the earmarks of a trust. Its control of the market on oxide of zinc is so complete that the paint mixers and makers of the country, with the exception of one large firm, are at its mercy.

The fact that Mr. Jones participated in the organization of this monopoly and enjoys its unconscionable profits, throws a strong light on his connection with and support of the Harvester Trust.

For all of these reasons the committee reports against Mr. Jones's confirmation. It believes that the great powers of the Reserve Board should not in any degree be exercised by men who are defying the laws of the United States. The powers of the board over bank credits and currency should be exercised by men in sympathy with the effort now being made to free the business world from unfair methods of business, monopoly practices, and destructive competition. They should be men not under the domination of, nor in alliance with, those who have been notorious as creators of monopoly in the world of business or in the world of finance.

G. M. HITCHCOCK,
Acting Chairman.

CHICAGO, July 18, 1914.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
Acting Chairman Banking and Currency Committee,
United States Senate.

SIR: I am in receipt to-day of a copy of the report of the majority of your committee upon my nomination as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and I have received part 2 of the hearings before the committee, said part 2 comprising documentary evidence submitted to the committee after I appeared before it.

I infer from the discussion in the committee reported in the hearings that these documents are sent to me with intimation that I am at liberty to make such comments thereupon as I may deem advisable, and I wish to take advantage of this privilege. As these documents have reached me only on a Saturday, and I am advised that my comments should be mailed by Monday noon, my comments must be both hasty and fragmentary.

I was invited to appear before your committee to be examined concerning my "relations with certain business enterprises." Those enterprises turned out to be the International Harvester Co. and the New Jersey Zinc Co. and some of its subsidiaries.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.

I stated to your committee that my relations with the International Harvester Co. began in 1909, and that before that time I had had no relations of any kind, direct or indirect, with it, and had had no business relations whatever with any of its officers or directors. Any just criticism based upon my being a director of the International Harvester Co. must rest either upon the fact of my accepting a directorship in that company in 1909 or upon acts of the company or of its board of directors subsequent to that date.

As to my acceptance of the position of director, it must be judged by the conditions and situation at the date of the act. The company had then been in existence and doing business for more than six years. The facts connected with its organization and its methods of doing business were open to the public and well known. The Government of the United States had taken no action against the company. There had been some suits against the company under State statutes, but, as I am advised and then believed and now believe, any judgments therein against the company were based wholly upon facts connected with its organization and not upon any of its business methods. I then believed and I still believe that at the date of my acceptance of the position of director the corporation was a law-abiding corporation, and that its business methods were productive of benefit and not of harm, and in that belief I accepted the position of director.

As to the other branch, namely the acts of the company and its board of directors since I became a director, so far as I have known they have been neither oppressive nor illegal in any particular. I believe that the record will bear me out in the statement which I now make, that not one single act of the company during that period was instanced in my hearing before the committee as constituting a violation of law.

There was put into the record after my hearing before the committee what appears to be practically the entire record of the suit brought by the State of Missouri against the International Harvester Co. In this case the company submitted freely and fully all its records for examination by the authorities of Missouri, and after the taking of voluminous evidence the court held that by reason of the circumstances attending the organization of the company it was an illegal organization under the antitrust acts of the State of Missouri.

More important, however, in my judgment, than the determination by the court of illegality in the formation of the company is the fact that the charges of unfair dealing by the company toward the farmers, which had been vigorously charged by the State, and concerning which a large amount of evidence was taken, were emphatically denied by the court. Upon this point the court said:

"The evidence also shows that the price of harvester machines was not materially higher after the New Jersey corporation entered the field than it was before, until 1908, when it was increased 8 or 10 per cent, whilst in the meantime there had been a greater increase in the price of the material and labor used in their construction. The evidence also shows that whilst harvesting machines were the chief products of the companies absorbed by the International Harvester Co., that company has greatly enlarged its business and extended it to many other farm implements, and has thus put itself in competition with the many concerns that theretofore were and still are engaged in manufacturing such other farm implements, and the farmers generally have profited thereby. The evidence also shows that the machines manufactured by the International Harvester Co. have been greatly improved in quality, and the item of repair material has been reduced in price and placed within closer reach of the farmer. On the whole, the evidence shows that the International Harvester Co. has not used its power to oppress or injure the farmers, who are its customers." (Hearings, pt. 2, pp. 117, 118.)

Reference was made during my hearing to the suit brought in 1912 by the Federal Government in the Minnesota district for dissolution of the International Harvester Co. A very large amount of testimony was taken in that suit, and the suit has been fully argued before the court, and has been submitted to it, and is now held under advisement by the court. What the outcome of that suit may be can only be surmised.

I had expected to find in the record of the hearings before the committee copy of a letter reported in the newspapers of June 24 and 25 to have been written by Mr. Edwin P. Grosvenor, who had charge under the Attorney General of that suit from beginning to end. I am disappointed to find that the letter nowhere appears in the hearings, although it was stated in the papers that it had been presented to your committee. I can, therefore, only refer to the substance of that letter as stated in the newspapers and which, it will be understood, I state under correction. In that letter Mr. Grosvenor is reported to have stated that the record in the Federal suit above referred to contains nothing to indicate that I had had any connection with any practices which the Government contends were illegal. In the absence of the final judgment of the court this is as conclusive a statement of the facts shown by that record as the circumstances permit.

As to the fourteenth charge in the majority report, I wish to say that my own memory was at fault when I appeared before the committee as to the date when the International Harvester Corporation was organized. It was then my recollection that it was organized just previously to the institution of the suit against the company by the Federal Government, which is now pending. Upon refreshing my recollection I find that the suit by the Government was begun April 30, 1912, while the International Harvester Corporation was not organized until January 27, 1913. The organization of that company and the sale of certain of the assets of the old company to the new were therefore done pendente lite, and could not, therefore, in the least affect any judgment that might be rendered in that suit. This charge in the majority report is utterly baseless.

THE NEW JERSEY ZINC CO. AND ITS SUBSIDIARIES.

This company is stigmatized in the majority report as "the Zinc Trust," and in support of that charge it is alleged (1) that it owns "practically all the known zinc ore in the United States," and it is charged that it has a monopoly of the manufacture and sale of oxide of zinc; and (2) that its capital stock—$10,000,000—is "inflated," and that it is making "an unconscionable profit" upon its inflated capitalization.

(1) As to the alleged monopoly of raw material, the statement that the New Jersey Zinc Co. "owns practically all the known zinc ore in the United States" is made without one particle of evidence in the record to support it. Moreover, everybody who knows the beggarly rudiments of the zinc industry knows that the statement is not simply false, it is rediculously false. Perfectly accurate, reliable data regarding the tonnage of zinc ores mined is not readily obtainable, but the census reports of manufactured product afford a sufficiently accurate basis for calculation as to ores produced. "From the best information available I feel warranted in stating positively that the total zinc contents of all ores derived from mines owned by the New Jersey Zinc Co., or in which it has any interest, through its subsidiaries or otherwise, amount to somewhat less than 25 per cent of the zinc contents of all zinc ores mined in the United States." (Statement of Mr. Jones of July 16, 1914.)

The majority report further says that "prior to 1897 Mr. Jones and his brother owned the Wisconsin mines." Neither my brother nor I, nor the Mineral Point Zinc Co., owned in 1897, or at any time prior thereto, any zinc mines in Wisconsin. My testimony shows that in 1897, when we sold our stock in the Mineral Point Zinc Co. to the New Jersey Zinc Co., we owned one undeveloped mine in New Mexico, and that was all the mining property that we did own.

So much for the monopoly of raw material.

As to the alleged monopoly of the manufacture and sale of oxide of zinc, my testimony shows that the New Jersey Zinc Co. produces a largely preponderant share of the oxide of zinc manufactured in this country, but it also shows that this preponderance results entirely from the ownership of one mine which produces ore suited to the manufacture of oxide of zinc as no other known ores are suited, and that until that mine is exhausted, or until radical discoveries are made in processes of manufacture, the owners of that mine must hold a preponderant share of the business of oxide of zinc.

Of the other two main products manufactured by this company, namely, spelter and sulphuric acid, the New Jersey Zinc Co. and its subsidiaries produce a little less than 20 per cent of the total output of spelter in this country and produce between 3 and 4 per cent of the sulphuric acid manufactured in this country.

(2) As to the alleged inflation of the capital stock of the New Jersey Zinc Co. and the making of "unconscionable profits," I would say that I testified that the capital assets of that company are equal to its capital stock, and that there is therefore no kind or degree of inflation of any sort, and there is no testimony whatever to the contrary. As to the alleged "unconscionable profits," I wish further to say that the majority report entirely ignores the statement which I made as to the nature of the business of the company. I stated that the company is largely, though not exclusively, a mining company. Every ton that is taken from the company's principal mine results so far in the exhaustion of its capital assets. Its earnings are therefore in the nature of a distribution of its capital assets, and not simply earnings in the ordinary sense of that term. The larger its production the more rapidly does the exhaustion of its assets proceed. This distinction between the earnings of an ordinary manufacturing or trading corporation and the earnings of a mining corporation is fully recognized in law, and is not wholly foreign to common sense. Before a judgment can be formed that is even approximately just as to whether the earnings of a mining corporation are unconscionable or not many elements have to be considered that were not even touched upon during my examination. In the particular case under consideration the ores produced from the principal mine of the New Jersey Zinc Co. are very complex, and require a very expensive plant for the treatment of the ores before they are ready for manufacture. This plant is necessarily situated at the mine, and when the mine is exhausted that expensive plant will be almost pure scrap. A very expensive reduction plant has been erected by the company at Palmerton, designed especially for the reduction of the kind of ores that are produced at this mine. What value this plant will have after the exhaustion of that mine is a matter of pure conjecture. Before any profits derived from the business of the company can fairly be pronounced to be unconscionable it must be taken into consideration that not only the value of the mine itself but the cost both of its plant for ore treatment and its principal plant for reduction ought to be met out of its earnings while the mine lasts, together with a fair return on the investment in the meantime. These various elements would require a complicated calculation which I myself am not fully capable of making, and with all due respect to the Committee on Banking and Currency I may say that I think it is wholly beyond the capacity of that committee to make such calculation.

When the invitation of the committee was extended to me to appear before it I was given to understand that I was expected only to give information concerning my own "relations with certain business enterprises." No reasonable interpretation of that language could have warned me that I was expected to come prepared to make a complete and detailed statement with regard to the entire business of the corporations with which I was connected. I had no intimation whatever of the scope of the inquiry. I had no reason to anticipate that the committee proposed to exercise what is essentially a judicial function, namely, to inquire and to determine whether any particular organization is a trust in the sense of being an organization under the ban of the law. Numerous questions were presented to me which even an active executive officer of the corporations in question could not have answered without reference to the records of the corporations. I have never been an officer of the New Jersey Zinc Co. Under the circumstances I might well have asked the committee to excuse me from answering many, if not most, of the questions asked; but I chose rather to answer every question as best I could, relying upon the confident belief that the sole object of the inquiry was to ascertain my relation to those corporations, and not to pass judgment upon them. The result is known far and wide. In an inquiry ostensibly intended simply to determine my fitness for public office a corporation in which I was a director has been branded as a "trust" and its earnings stigmatized as "unconscionable," and these charges were spread broadcast through the public press under the great authority of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate of the United States. And this, too, occurred in the case of a corporation which in its present form had been carrying on its business for 17 years, and against which not a single accusation has ever been made in any tribunal, either Federal or State, that its organization is illegal or that its practices are oppressive or extortionate. I submit to your honorable committee that such procedure is grossly unfair.

I append hereto a list of certain corrections which I ask your committee to put into the record in connection with my testimony. The time at my disposal has been insufficient to enable me to note more than corrections that I deem of importance. Some of these corrections are clearly clerical, but others result from defective memory on my part or from obvious misunderstanding of questions asked. This list of corrections, especially relating to the New Jersey Zinc Co. and its subsidiaries, is still distinctly incomplete.

Respectfully submitted.

THOMAS D. JONES.

MEMORANDUM OF CORRECTIONS IN RECORD OF THE EXAMINATION OF THOMAS D. JONES.

(References are to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 15, 1914.)

I. CONCERNING INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.

(1) In column 1, page 13231, my answer "That the company carries a certain amount of stock which it issues to its stockholders by way of bonus," should read, "which it issues to its employees by way of bonus."

(2) In column 1, page 13232, the statement in regard to the secretary of the company should be, "Harold F. McCormick was acting secretary from 1909 up to 1914, when G. A. Ranney was chosen secretary, and is now the secretary of the company."

(3) In column 1, page 13232, the statement that "common stock" of the company was issued to employees should be corrected so as to include "preferred" as well as common stock.

(4) In column 1, page 13233, the statement concerning plows should be amended by adding that the company does not manufacture or sell plows in the United States, but the International Harvester Co. of Canada (Ltd.), the owner of the Canadian plant, jobs plows in Canada but does not make them.

(5) In column 1, page 13233, to the list of European plants should be added the plant of the company at Neuss, Germany.

(6) All statements relating to the formation of the new corporation now owning the foreign plants and the new line plants in the United States should be corrected so as to conform to the following statements:

In January, 1913, the International Harvester Co. had a capital stock of $140,000,000, $60,000,000 preferred and $80,000,000 common. The new corporation, "International Harvester Corporation," was organized on January 27, 1913, under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital of $70,000,000, $30,000,000 preferred and $40,000,000 common. This was after the bringing of the Government suit, which was filed on April 30, 1912. As it was expected that the pending Government suit might not be ended for a considerable time and might go to the Supreme Court for final settlement, it was deemed necessary to organize the new corporation to protect, as far as possible, its foreign trade, which was not under attack, and its credit for foreign borrowings, which were very large. The new corporation bought the foreign plants and business of the original company and also its domestic plants making the new lines, and paid for the same by delivering to the old company its entire capital stock. The old company thereupon reduced its capital stock one-half and, in exchange for the stock retired by said reduction, issued to its stockholders the stock of the new corporation share for share of the same kind of stock; so that each stockholder, after the transaction was completed, had the same number and kind of shares of stock that he had before the formation of the new corporation, representing the same interest and ownership in the same properties as before the exchange.

The new corporation and the transfer of the properties to it were made with the full knowledge of the Attorney General of the United States, the entire plan being submitted in writing to him and being made pendente lite, had no effect whatever upon the Government suit.

(7) The statement in regard to the dividends paid and net earnings of the International Harvester Co. should be corrected to conform to the following table, which is compiled from the published annual reports of the company, and is in some respects at variance with my recollection, as contained in my statement before the committee. There is, however, no question as to its accuracy, and the figures without the per cents are contained in the petition in the Government suit, except for the years 1911 and 1912:

Year.	Net earnings.	Percentage of net earnings to capital stock and surplus.	Dividends.	Rate of dividends on capital stock.
		Per cent.		Per cent.
1903	$5,641,181	4.70	$3,600,000	3.00
1904	5,658,535	4.64	4,800,000	4.00
1905	7,479,187	6.08	4,800,000	4.00
1906	7,346,947	5.85	4,800,000	4.00
1907	8,080,458	6.31	4,200,000	[1] 3.50
1908	8,885,682	6.73	4,200,000	[1] 3.50
1909	14,892,740	10.89	4,200,000	[1] 3.50
1910	16,084,819	10.91	7,400,000	[2] 5.29
1911	15,521,397	9.95	8,200,000	[2] 5.86
1912	16,395,597	10.03	8,200,000	[2] 5.86
Average for 10 years	10,598,654	7.83	5,440,000	4.25

[1] 7 per cent on preferred, nothing on common.
[2] 7 per cent on preferred, 4 per cent on common.
[3] 7 per cent on preferred, 5 per cent on common.

In January, 1910, a stock dividend of $20,000,000 was declared on the common stock on which no dividends had been paid since 1906, and prior to that time the total dividends had averaged less than 4 per cent. This stock dividend gave to the stockholders nothing except more shares, representing the same amount of property in which the undistributed earnings had been invested. Including this stock dividend, the average dividend on the total capital was only 5.90 per cent per annum.

The stock of the original company was all of one kind until 1907, when it was divided into preferred and common in equal amounts, and thereafter there was no payment of dividends on the common stock until 1910. In January, 1910, the stock dividend of $20,000,000 was declared out of the surplus which had been accumulated while the company had paid inadequate or no dividends on the common stock.

(8) In column 2, page 13239, the statement as to the annual profits refers to the year 1912, and should be that the gross profit for that year was $16,395,597.16, and after the payment of the 7 per cent dividend on the preferred and 5 per cent on the common left a balance carried to surplus of $8,195,597.16.

(9) In column 1, page 13240, with reference to the number of local dealers or agents through whom a farmer can deal in buying the company's various brands of harvesting machines, I had and have no personal knowledge, but, as I am advised, I was in error in assenting to Senator NELSON'S statement that the company deals with the farmer only through one agent instead of several, as before the company's organization. In fact, the report of the Bureau of Corporations objects to the practice of the selling company in the United States of dividing among the local dealers its various brands of harvesters instead of giving them all to one dealer (p. 303).

(10) In column 1, page 13240, in relation to Senator HITCHCOCK'S question, my statement that no new capital had gone into the enterprise had reference to what was done subsequent to the organization of the company, and had no reference to the capital which went in at the date of the organization of the company. My answer in the record, if considered otherwise, was made under a misapprehension of the question. I had no personal connection with or knowledge of the organization of the company or of the capital paid in at the date of its organization; but I am advised and believe that a very large amount of new capital went into the business at the date of the organization of the International Harvester Co.

II. CONCERNING THE NEW JERSEY ZINC CO.

1. During my examination Senator REED asked me the following question: "How many combinations have been taken into that New Jersey company, absorbed or financed in any way?" (C. R., 13243, col. 1.)

I understood that question to refer to the companies which were consolidated with the New Jersey Zinc Co. in 1897, as appears from other portions of my testimony. Upon reading my testimony it appears that Senator REED'S question really covered not simply the companies referred to, but subsidiaries subsequently organized or acquired. My answer to that inquiry therefore, viz, "Two besides ours," was not correct. Besides the three corporations mentioned in my testimony as subsidiaries of the New Jersey Zinc Co., there are the following, viz: The New Jersey Zinc Co. (of Pennsylvania), Palmer Land Co., Palmer Water Co., the Chestnut Ridge Railway Co., Tulsa Fuel & Manufacturing Co., and the Bertha Mineral Co.

2. In stating the amount of the total spelter trade of the country (C. R., 13243, col. 1) I am quoted as stating that it amounts to $375,000 to $400,000. This is simply a clerical error, and should have read "375,000 to 400,000 tons."

THOMAS D. JONES.

[Executive Report No. 1, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

THOMAS D. JONES.

(To accompany the nomination of Thomas D. Jones to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board.)

Mr. LEE of Maryland. As a member of the minority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I recommend that the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of Mr. Thomas D. Jones to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and state as follows:

REPORT.

Mr. Jones being invited by the committee, appeared before it.

There was much to commend in the manner of the witness. He was perfectly frank, and made the impression of a modest man of courage, convictions, and ability.

The rules of the Senate have operated to prejudice the case of Mr. Jones, for the members of the committee who support him have respected the rules and gave nothing out for publication, while others, in disregard of the rules, have published incomplete statements and unfair arguments against him.

The New York Times of July 18 says editorially:

"The condemnatory report is published, although it is a part of the confidential proceedings of the Senate, and although it is unfair that the conviction should be published without the defense. The text of the report shows it to be a partisan document, more anxious to make a case against the convict than to present a judicial examination of his qualifications."

CORRECTION NOT WAR ON AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

That the majority of the committee are bent on extreme measures; that their attitude is a dangerous one toward both the peace and industry of the country, is evident from their criticism of this nominee.

A choice is afforded the Senate in this case between an appeal to prejudice and hostile feeling and the wise and kindly purpose of the President, who has nominated for the reserve board in Mr. Thomas D. Jones a man he has known closely for many years and certifies to us as one of democratic convictions. In a letter to the committee the President recently said of Mr. Jones:

"I have been associated with Mr. Jones in various ways for more than 15 years and have seen him tried by fire in causes which were like the very causes we are fighting for now. He has always stood for the rights of the people against the rights of privilege, and he has won a place of esteem and confidence by his quiet power and unquestionable integrity in the city of Chicago, which is very enviable indeed.

"His connection with the Harvester Co. is this: He owns one share, and only one share, of stock in the company, which he purchased to qualify as a director. He went into the board of the Harvester Co. for the purpose of assisting to withdraw it from the control which had led it into the acts and practices which have brought it under the criticism of the law officers of the Government, and has been very effective in that capacity. His connection with these acts and practices is absolutely nil. His connection with it was a public service, not a private interest, and he has won additional credit and admiration for his courage in that matter.

"He is a lawyer by profession, but he has devoted his attention to special aspects of the law, and has been very little in the courts, I believe. My close association with him was in the board of trustees of Princeton University, where he stood by me with wonderful address and courage in trying to bring the university to true standards of democracy, by which it would serve not special classes, but the general body of our youth. He graduated from Princeton University in 1876. He is of Welsh extraction, possibly of Welsh birth, though I am not certain on that point, and is a man whom I can absolutely guarantee in every respect to the committee. He is the one man of the whole number who was in a peculiar sense my personal choice."

Question of practical democracy arose in the management of Princeton University, upon which these two thought alike and acted together. In carrying out his very large purpose of bringing about industrial reform in this country and maintaining peace and prosperity at the same time the President selected Mr. Jones for the Reserve Bank Board because he has confidence in him as a man and a Democrat, one well tested in a tense collegiate struggle, where the devotion to principle, which marked Woodrow Wilson for governor of New Jersey and President of the United States, naturally indicated Thomas D. Jones for a prominent place in the President's national reforms. Confidence based upon character is what of all things the country most needs just now. Mutual confidence on the part of the public, as expressed by the President, and on the part of business seems to be reposed in Mr. Jones.

The McCormick family, whose father invented the reaper, and who have continued for two generations in the business of making reapers and mowers, had confidence in him, and when they got into difficulties, probably both as to internal management and external attack on the monopolistic features of their organization, they called on him for help.

A MONOPOLY CORRECTED.

Mr. Jones testifies that no matter what power the Harvester Co., as organized, may have originally possessed, that power has not been used in any way contrary to law or public interest since he became a director in the concern (p. 40). He also testifies that competition with the Harvester Co. has grown each year and is to-day vigorous (p. 39), and that no plant in competition has been purchased by the Harvester Co. since he became a director (p. 27). Mr. Jones refused to approve of the method of organizing the Harvester Co. (p. 35).

This nominee further says (p. 49) that he would not have accepted a place on the board of the Harvester Co. if he had believed that it was then violating the Sherman antitrust law.

With reference to continuing offenses or such acts of an objectionable nature as might be claimed to have been committed since the election of Mr. Jones to the board of directors, the following question was asked (p. 4) by Senator HITCHCOCK:

"A part of the complaint [in the Federal suit] as it was read to the committee was with regard to continuing acts of the corporations down to very recent years, down to the filing of the suit in 1912. Have you any acquaintance with those acts complained of?"

And answered by Mr. Jones:

"No, sir; and my reading of the record was that, although there is such a general allegation, there is absolutely no proof of it. The charges were made as of continuing acts; but I read the briefs of counsel of the various sides, and the case finally turned almost entirely on the method of the original organization of the company as being an attempt to create a monopoly in restraint of trade."

The statement of the latter—that there was only general allegation and absolutely no proof of continuing offenses—has not been met in testimony before the committee and is apparently conceded.

Although submitted, no opinion has yet been rendered in the Federal suit of 1912. There is in hand a decision by the Supreme Court of Missouri (pp. 114 to 122), rendered in 1911, in a proceeding instituted in 1907, two years before Mr. Jones became a member of the board, and in this case the constitutionality of the Missouri antitrust statute was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in a recent decision (pp. 125 to 131).

MONOPOLY AS ORGANIZED, BUT NO DEFINITE ABUSE OF POWER.

The finding of the Missouri court tends to confirm the testimony of Mr. Jones above, the court saying (Record, pp. 117, 118):

"The evidence also shows that the price of Harvester machines was not materially higher after the New Jersey corporation entered the field than it was before until 1908, when it was increased 8 or 10 per cent, whilst in the meantime there had been a greater increase in the price of the material and labor used in their construction. The evidence also shows that whilst harvesting machines were the chief products of the companies absorbed by the International Harvester Co., that company has greatly enlarged its business and extended it to many other farm implements, and has thus put itself in competition with the many concerns that theretofore were and still are engaged in manufacturing such other farm implements, and the farmers generally have profited thereby. The evidence also shows that the machines manufactured by the International Co. have been greatly improved in quality, and the item of repair material has been reduced in price and placed within closer reach of the farmer. On the whole the evidence shows that the International Harvester Co. has not used its power to oppress or injure the farmers, who are its customers."

In the Missouri case all of the company's records were freely submitted and fully examined, but the Supreme Court of the United States, in reviewing this case, said the Supreme Court of Missouri "did not find a definite abuse of its powers by the plaintiff in error." (Record, pt. 2, p. 127.)

MISSOURI COURT PERMITS CONTINUANCE IN BUSINESS ON CORRECTED BASIS—SIMILAR TO VIEWS OF WITNESS.

Senator REED (p. 39) asserted that Mr. Jones's case presents an ethical question, namely, that if a concern is organized in an illegal manner, to become a member of it afterwards is illegal; but the witness answered denying this (p. 40). Mr. Jones asserted that, even though the organization included illegal power, yet there was no use made of the illegal power after he became a member, and he, therefore, was not a party to any unlawful act.

Not only do the foregoing quotations from the Missouri decision sustain the witness as to the conduct of the concern after he became a member of its board, but the judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri in permitting the company to continue in business on certain definite terms, which terms are practically analogous to the position of this witness, completely overthrows and answers the ethical suggestion of Senator REED. The court permitted the company (p. 121, Record, pt. 2) to continue to do business in Missouri on the following general basis:

"If the International Harvester Co. is to be permitted to continue to do business in this State, either in its own name or through the agency of respondent, it must be on condition that it shall not use its power either to force a competitor to sell or drive it out of the market by unfair methods, and that it will not raise the prices of the articles it sells beyond a fair profit on their cost and the expense of marketing the same."

RESTRAINS A MONOPOLY FROM THE INSIDE.

No defense of the Harvester Co. is necessary or attempted in this report. Every act of Mr. Jones in connection with that company seems to have been entirely proper and to have been part of a general business experience, well qualifying him to protect the public interest as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. He expressly states that he is not in sympathy with these big consolidations (p. 64) and that he is in thorough accord with President Wilson's policy in destroying monopoly (p. 65).

Apparently Mr. Jones and others with him have restrained a monopoly from the inside, which should commend him rather than subject him to a sort of attainder of blood, which the majority of the committee implies he took by official descent. Here seems to be a blind and passionate confusion of good with evil which can not be accepted without disastrous public consequences. A citizen who has no financial interest in the concern becomes a director from motives of personal friendship and public interest (p. 35). He and others with him prevent the concern, which was organized as a monopoly and has the bad name of a monopoly, from continuing to act unlawfully and as a monopoly. He certainly is not to be condemned for this.

The intelligent patriotism which manifested itself in the affairs of Princeton University should be utilized in the further service of Democratic reform. It is natural that the political party under whose administration the trusts were formed should oppose this nominee. That party's leaders do not wish the Democratic Party and President Wilson to succeed. They seem to pray for failure or panic to prevent all such reform. The Senate and the country may well rely upon the President's judgment of his comrade in arms.

MISLEADING STATEMENT OF MAJORITY AS TO ORGANIZATION OF FOREIGN CORPORATION.

The majority report says:

"Fourteenth. About the time the United States action was brought the trust divorced its foreign business from that in the United States by creating a separate concern, known as the International Harvester Corporation, and diverted about half of its great capital of that corporation, so that it might be beyond the reach of the United States in case the Government wins the action now pending. Mr. Jones participated in this act of invasion, as he did in earlier acts of defiance."

This statement is clearly in error, as the diversion did not take place until after the Government suit was filed and could not affect that suit.

But what are the undisputed facts according to the record of the manner in which this division of business was made?

The company had a large business abroad, with factories adapted to the peculiar needs of those countries. The actual investments abroad and in the new lines represented about one-half of the capital of the company at that time (pp. 21, 32). The business as conducted abroad was never claimed to be monopolistic, but, on the contrary, was highly competitive (pp. 22, 27, 37, 38).

Before the organization of the foreign company in 1913, the facts were frankly presented to the Department of Justice, which, while not conceding anything or releasing the power of the Federal court as it had attached, raised no objection to the expressed plans of the company to sever the ownership of its foreign property from that retained by the old company in the organization of this new company (pp. 17, 19, 20, 23, 30).

We submit that the statement of the majority, indicating as it does wrongdoing on the part of Mr. Jones in this connection, is most unfair and in keeping with the whole tenor of the majority report.

DIVIDENDS WITHHELD, SURPLUS ACCUMULATED.

The insinuation of wrongdoing on the part of Mr. Jones in participating in the issuance of a stock dividend based upon actual earnings of the company, as set forth in paragraph 8 of the majority report, is likewise unjust.

There is no dispute about the properties turned into the original incorporation in 1902 being equal in value to the capital stock of $120,000,000.

The assets had so increased December 31, 1907, according to the report of the commissioner in the Missouri case (p. 103), adopted by the Supreme Court of Missouri (p. 116), that they were then valued at $156,282,654.16.

The criticism is based upon an increase of the capital stock by $20,000,000 in 1910 by way of a stock dividend to the holders of common stock.

On the subject of this dividend, Mr. Jones, in his supplemental statement after tabulating the earnings and dividends, says:

"In June, 1910, a stock dividend of $20,000,000 was declared on the common stock on which no dividends had been paid since 1906 and prior to that time the total dividends had averaged less than 4 per cent. This stock dividend gave the stockholders nothing except more shares, representing the same amount of property in which the undistributive earnings had been invested. Including stock dividends, the average dividend on the total capital stock was only 5.90 per cent per annum."

NEW JERSEY ZINC CO.

The majority report is most unfortunate and misleading as to facts under this head.

PLAIN ERRORS AND OMISSIONS IN MAJORITY REPORT.

This report states (p. 4):

"The company (New Jersey Zinc Co.) owns practically all the known zinc ore in the United States." There was no such testimony before the committee.

"From the best information available I feel warranted in stating positively that the total zinc contents of all ores derived from mines owned by the New Jersey Zinc Co., or in which it has any interest, through its subsidiaries or otherwise, amount to somewhat less than 25 per cent of the zinc contents of all zinc ores mined in the United States." (Mr. Jones's letter, p. 4.)

This is confirmed by the United States Geological Survey. The majority of the committee could easily have ascertained the facts by inquiry of anyone informed as to the zinc industries or of the Geological Survey.

On page 5 the report says that the New Jersey Zinc Co.'s control of the market on oxide of zinc is so complete that the paint mixers of the country, with the exception of one large firm, are at its mercy. Mr. Jones, when before the committee, stated (p. 60) that the Mine Hill mine of the New Jersey Zinc Co. is the only mine of its kind in the world, but is being rapidly exhausted. This company, only because it owns this mine, is making 85 per cent of the oxide of zinc produced in the United States, but it is used in combination with white lead in paints (p. 58), and is also keenly competitive with white lead (p. 57). White lead has a controlling influence upon the price of oxide of zinc, and there are three or four times as much white lead used (pp. 66–67). On this subject Mr. Jones said:

"They are the real competitors, and they are very vigorous competitors.

"When you say that we have 85 per cent of the oxide of zinc trade, that is misleading, because the real competitor of zinc is white lead, and every movement in either one of these products affects the other, and there is a very keen and lively competition, and always has been, between white lead and zinc. * * * I should say there is probably three or four times as much white lead as there is oxide of zinc (p. 67).

"In addition, there is competition with French zinc, which, though 2 cents a pound more, is a heavier pigment and goes further" (p. 60).

The attitude of Mr. Jones toward large combinations, his sympathy with the President's policy in destroying monopoly, and the fact that the public usefulness of the New Jersey mine was increased by adding other mines to it are shown by the following parts of his testimony (pp. 65 and 56):

"Senator CRAWFORD. Are you in sympathy with the general policy of these big consolidations, with the power that may be, in the abstract, dangerous, depending entirely on whether the men who are using it are good men or bad men?

"Mr. JONES. No, sir; I am not in sympathy with them.

"Senator CRAWFORD. You really do not believe in it?

"Mr. JONES. I do not, frankly. I am giving my personal impressions now, and not those of any corporations I may be connected with. I think industrially most of them are failures, and the difficulty is that they reduce the individual to a mere unit.

"Senator CRAWFORD. Your idea is that if one of them is organized it may be dangerous or it may be kept within bounds by the right kind of a board of directors; that you could accept a position on the board of directors for the purpose of keeping it within bounds, although there was a dangerous power vested in it?

"Mr. JONES. I think they can be kept within reasonable bounds perfectly well, and I think many of them are.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. You think this is not a combination in restraint of trade or in control of trade—the New Jersey Zinc Co.?

"Mr. JONES. I do not.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. It has 85 per cent, you say, of the zinc trade of the country?

"Mr. JONES. Of the oxide of zinc.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. Of the oxide of zinc, I mean; yes.

"Mr. JONES. About that.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. Well, is there any other concern that controls a larger per cent of the products it manufactures?

"Mr. JONES. Not oxide of zinc.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. No; I mean of any other industry. Is there any other company that comes any nearer to monopolizing a certain product?

"Mr. JONES. No, sir. As I said, so long as oxide of zinc continues to be made out of the New Jersey mine ores the trade demands it and will not have anything else. It makes a grade of oxide of zinc that can not be made out of any other known ores in this country. I will say, frankly, that that mine is the whole business. There is no artificial combination of units to eliminate competition. That has not been attempted at all and has not been accomplished, but that mine continues a natural monopoly.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. Suppose your company and these others had not been united with the New Jersey corporation; would there be some competition between them?

"Mr. JONES. Well, as I told you before, we were up against it, because we could not get ores that would make a product that would meet all the needs of our customers; and it was in order to get a product that would meet the needs of our customers that we were willing—we had not any desire, but were willing—to sell our properties to the New Jersey Co. for stock in that company; and ever since then, as I told you, we have mixed the two and made a good product out of the mixture. I believe it has been industrially a great advantage to our customers, and my own judgment is that our customers have been fairly treated; and, as you have seen, there has been no combination in restraint of trade.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. One of the purposes in creating the new banking and currency system is to decentralize the banking power in the United States?

"Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. Which has been used to create monopolies. And I suppose that thought has been in the minds of some when the question arose as to your connection with two concerns which seem to have for their purpose a creating of great combinations; and the committee was curious to know whether your views were in harmony with the opinion of the country, which is strongly opposed to anything tending to centralize or monopolize business?

"Mr. JONES. I have not the slightest hesitation in answering any questions along that line that may be asked, as to what my views may be as to general policy. I am thoroughly in accord with what I believe to be President Wilson's policy in destroying monopoly.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. How would you go to work in destroying the zinc monopoly?

"Mr. JONES. I do not believe it is destructive, because I do not believe it is a monopoly in that sense.

"Senator CRAWFORD. That is a case where the supply has been limited by nature and is now limited by artificial combinations?

"Mr. JONES. Exactly.

"Senator HITCHCOCK. Yes; it looks that way.

"Senator SHAFROTH. There is no law requiring a man who owns a mine, if there is no other mine of the kind in the world, to divide it up so as to permit of competition?

"Senator CRAWFORD. By destroying the combination you could not increase the output from that mine.

* * * * * * *

"Senator LEE. Senator CRAWFORD has just called your attention to the fact that nothing could be done to increase the product of that New Jersey mine, and yet the combination that you have made really increased the applicability and public usefulness of the product of that mine, did it not?

"Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; it has made the output a great deal more, although, of course, that hastens the exhaustion."

BLAIR LEE.

MINORITY REPORT ON THE NOMINATION OF MR. THOMAS D. JONES AS A MEMBER OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.

A careful reading of the hearings in this case, and the report of the majority of the committee, shows that it is:

First and principally an indictment, arraignment, trial, and conviction of the International Harvester Co. as a trust in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. A case to determine this issue is now pending in the Federal courts.

The International Harvester Co. was organized in 1902. Mr. Thomas D. Jones was elected a director of this company in April, 1909. The suit against the company was begun by the Department of Justice in the summer of 1912. Mr. Jones, the evidence shows, bought one share of stock, of the par value of $100, and paid for it in order to qualify as a director at the special request of Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick, a friend of many years standing.

After Mr. Jones became a director in the International Harvester Co. he attended most of the meetings of the directors held in Chicago and several of those held in New York City. He approved and acquiesced in such matters as were brought before the board. There is nothing in the record to show that anything which was acted upon at these meetings was in violation of any law, statutory or common, Federal or State, by any direct evidence or by any circumstantial evidence, unless it be the mere fact that the corporation continued to exist and do business. If any of the acts of the board of directors during the time that Mr. Jones was a member thereof violated any law of the land we respectfully invite our brethren who have joined in the majority report to point out specifically what those acts were.

Secondly, the report is an indictment, arraignment, trial, and conviction of the New Jersey Zinc Co. as a trust in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, against which company, so far as the record shows, and so far as we have any information, no complaint has been made either in any State or Federal court attacking the legality of its organization or any of its acts.

Mr. Jones is a large stockholder in this company and a director, and presumably has taken an active part in its management and development, as well as in some of the subsidiary companies owned and controlled by it.

It is very prosperous and has proven to be an unusually profitable investment. The New Jersey Zinc Co. and its subsidiary companies manufacture and sell about 85 per cent of the oxide of zinc, 3 per cent of the sulphuric acid, and 20 per cent of the spelter of our domestic trade. The oxide of zinc is a base for paint and sells in competition with lead in the ratio of 1 of zinc to 3 or 4 of lead. It also produces about 25 per cent of the entire output of zinc ore in this country. The New Jersey mine, known as the Mine Hill, because of the peculiar quality of its ore, is a natural monopoly. It is the only known deposit of zinc ore entirely suitable for paint. We assume that it has never been disputed that a man is entitled to all that he grows on his land or all that he produces from his mine. The ore from the other mines is not merchantable as a base for paint except as it is used in conjunction with the ore taken from the Mine Hill. How long the supply of the Mine Hill ore will last is only conjectural.

While the profits of this company have been very large, it is significant that no action has been begun against the company or its subsidiaries so far as this committee knows for any violation of any law, Federal or State. If there is in the record any evidence showing such violation, the majority of the committee has failed to point it out.

Third. We submit that the report shows no violation of any law by Mr. Jones, either personally or as a director, unless it be inferentially from the fact that he was a director and participated in such business of the International Harvester Co. as came before its board of directors and because of his interest and connection with the business and management of the New Jersey Zinc Co.

We hold no brief for the International Harvester Co. We are here neither to condemn nor to defend the organization, operation, or business methods of either the International Harvester Co. or of the New Jersey Zinc Co. If they, or either of them or their officers, have violated the law, we offer no palliation for the offense. We submit that there is nothing in the record showing that Mr. Jones in either company violated any law. There remain therefore but two questions to consider—

First. His qualifications.

Second. The expediency of his nomination.

As bearing upon these questions we refer to the following facts taken from the record:

On page 5 of the hearing Mr. Jones says:

"I had the time to give it (the International Harvester Co.), and the relations of corporations to their employees and to the public is an interesting question, and I was willing to give the time and I had the time to give, and I met the request of my friends for those reasons, and at the same time I recognized that it was a work that was worth giving some time and attention to, and I did give such time and attention as the work seemed to require."

Again, on page 5 of the record, Mr. Jones says:

"The relation of the company to its employees has had a good deal of attention by the board of the International Harvester Co. in the way of profit sharing and schemes of that sort, which are occupying the attention of the directors of a great many corporations at the present time, which are not yet satisfactorily solved, but they will be later."

This reference to this principle is not made in a boastful way, but very modestly, and we believe it was the controlling factor in determining him to become a member of the board of directors of the International Harvester Co.

Again, on page 38 of the record, the following questions were asked and the answers given:

"Senator POMERENE. When you expressed your approval of the transactions and business methods of the International Harvester Co. since your connection with it, did you have in mind and give your approval in that statement to the original organization of the company?

"Mr. JONES. I did not, sir.

"Senator POMERENE. Or any of the transactions of that company between the date of its organization and the time when you became a directing force in the company?

"Mr. JONES. I limited my statement, or meant to do so, strictly to the transactions of the company after I had become a director.

"Senator POMERENE. The purpose of my question was to make that perfectly clear.

"Mr. JONES. I want to make that clear."

On page 49 of the record the following question was asked and answered:

"Senator HOLLIS. Now, if you had believed that these other officials with whom you associated yourself were lawbreakers and were acting in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, would you have become a director?

"Mr. JONES. No, sir; I would not if I thought so at the time."

On page 69 of the record the following questions were asked and answers given:

"Senator CRAWFORD. Are you in sympathy with the general policy of these big consolidations, with the power that may be, in the abstract, dangerous, depending entirely on whether the men who are it are good men or bad men?

"Mr. JONES. No, sir; I am not in sympathy with them.

"Senator CRAWFORD. You really do not believe in it?

"Mr. JONES. I do not, frankly. I am giving my personal impressions, now, and not those of any corporations I may be connected with. I think industrially most of them are failures, and the difficulty is that they reduce the individual to a mere unit."

So far as we know, no man has said aught against his character or his preeminent ability to fill the position with satisfaction to his country and with credit to himself. The President, who named him for the place, wrote to the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, under date of June 18, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1914.

DEAR SENATOR: I am afraid that Mr. Thomas D. Jones is the man about whom the committee will have the least information, and I venture to write you this letter to tell you what I know, and fortunately I can say that I really do know it.

I have been associated with Mr. Jones in various ways for more than 15 years, and have seen him tried by fire in causes which were like the very causes we are fighting for now. He has always stood for the rights of the people against the rights of privilege, and he has won a place of esteem and confidence by his quiet power and unquestionable integrity in the city of Chicago which is very enviable indeed.

His connection with the Harvester Co. is this: He owns one share, and only one share, of stock in the company which he purchased to qualify as a director. He went into the board of the Harvester Co. for the purpose of assisting to withdraw it from the control which had led it into the acts and practices which have brought it under the criticism of the law officers of the Government, and has been very effective in that capacity. His connection with it was a public service, not a private interest, and he has won additional credit and admiration for his courage in that matter.

He is a lawyer by profession, but he has devoted his attention to special aspects of the law and has been very little in the courts, I believe. My close association with him was in the board of trustees of Princeton University, where he stood by me with wonderful address and courage in trying to bring the university to true standard of democracy by which it would serve not special classes, but the general body of our youth. He graduated from Princeton University in 1876. He is of Welsh extraction, possibly of Welsh birth, though I am not certain on that point, and is a man whom I can absolutely guarantee in every respect to the committee. He is the one man of the whole number who was in a peculiar sense my personal choice.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

No higher testimonial could be given than this letter from the President of the United States, who has known him so long and so intimately, stands sponsor for him, and who is so much interested in the success of the new banking system. All who know Mr. Jones personally, so far as we have been advised, concur in the wisdom of his choice.

Because of the pendency of the suit against the International Harvester Co., in which Mr. Jones is a party defendant, men may honestly differ as to the wisdom of the appointment from the standpoint of expediency, but no one, in our judgment, can fairly doubt his qualifications. We submit that all questions of expediency should give way to his preeminent fitness, as testified to by those who know him best.

We therefore recommend that the Senate do advise and consent to his confirmation.

ATLEE POMERENE.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12919. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I submit and ask to have printed and lie on the table an amendment to House bill 15657. As it is very short, consisting of one paragraph, I ask to have it read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 17, line 2, insert:

"No person shall be eligible for the position of member of the Federal Reserve Board or member of the Federal trade commission or for any other position of honor, subject to appointment by the President, who is a director, manager, trustee, or other officer of a corporation operating in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State or resisting in court the enforcement of same."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES DURING SESSIONS OF SENATE.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we have now entered upon the most important work of this session, or, indeed, of any session held in the last 20 years. The three bills which constitute proposals for legislation upon the subject of trusts and monopolies are now before the Senate. I assume that it will not be possible for all Senators to attend at all times the sessions of the Senate; it may not be convenient for many Senators to attend constantly, but I desire a condition in which there will be nothing to prevent the attendance of Senators upon the debate which is about to take place. Therefore, in pursuance of a notice I gave some time ago, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 430) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That from and after the passage of this resolution, and until otherwise ordered, all permits given in resolutions, orders, or otherwise, authorizing standing or select committees to sit during the sessions of the Senate, are hereby rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the passage of the resolution. I simply wish the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] to be informed of its contents.

Mr. KERN. What are its contents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will reread the resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let it be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. KERN. I have no objection to the resolution. Of course the spirit of it is all right. There are some committees that I suppose ought to be excepted; that is, at least two that I have in mind. One is a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee, which is conducting an investigation, and I understand has witnesses before it. I refer to the coal investigation of the Naval Affairs Committee.

I will inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether this resolution contemplates or takes into account conference committees?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are no such bodies as conference committees.

Mr. KERN. Well, they are conferees.

Mr. CUMMINS. And this resolution does not apply to managers of a conference.

Mr. KERN. I do not know the situation with reference to the investigation by the subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not, either. I only know that in the consideration of the bills that are now before the Senate every Senator ought to be at liberty to attend the meetings of the Senate. I do not suppose every Senator will attend, but there ought not to be any superior engagement compelling him to be absent.

Mr. KERN. I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa in that observation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, there are times at which these committees can meet when the Senate will not be in session. We have now reached a point, it seems to me, where we ought to give our undivided attention to the legislation upon this subject, for we are about to do something that will affect, for good or for ill, more people than were ever before affected by legislation of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, agreeing fully with the purpose the Senator has in view, I desire to call attention to the fact that there is one very important committee that I apprehend is working day and night, and that is the committee that is going to discover how the secrets of the executive sessions get into the newspapers. [Laughter.] That committee ought not to be hampered in its work.

Mr. CUMMINS. In response to the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. President, recognizing the vast and vital importance of the work of that committee, I will only say that it can apply to the Senate at any time for leave to sit, and if it is able to show that its work is so imperative I have no doubt the Senate will give it leave to sit during the sessions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it the Senator's understanding that a committee engaged in the business of the Senate can not hold its sessions while the Senate is in session without special permission from the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we have no rule upon that subject save the general rule of parliamentary law as laid down in Jefferson's Manual. It would be no offense, I assume, but we now have upon the records of the Senate 15 or 20 resolutions permitting practically every committee having in charge legislation to sit during the sessions of the Senate. These sittings, according to the statement of Senators, have interfered with their presence in the Senate during the progress of debate, and I want to relieve the situation of that obstacle.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, my understanding is that this resolution, if adopted, would not prohibit committees from sitting during the sessions of the Senate. It would operate probably as an expression of the sentiment of the Senate that Senators ought to attend the sessions of the Senate, but there might be, in a great many cases, emergencies requiring the action of committees during the sessions of the Senate. I think it would be impracticable to require that in each case they should obtain a special permit or order before they could transact that business.

I agree with the Senator that the business before the Senate is of paramount importance, and that Senators ought to attend; but, as the Senator has just said, it may not be practicable. I think he used the word "convenient." He might use a stronger word. It might not be possible in some cases, or consistent with the performance of the duties of a Senator, for him to attend the sessions of the Senate at all times that these bills may be before the Senate for consideration.

Some reference has been made to the inquiry of the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs which is now in progress. More or less elaborate proceedings have developed there, and the attendance of a large number of persons, and it is perfectly practicable for that subcommittee to continue to hold hearings during at least a portion of the time that the Senate may be in session. It holds its sessions in the Capitol Building, within immediate reach of the Senate Chamber; and while all Senators would desire to hear everything that is going on in the Senate Chamber, it is not necessary at all times that they should do so. I do not think it would be expedient to prohibit that committee, or the Judiciary Committee, or any committee that may be considering important nominations which the President may send to the Senate, from sitting at convenient times, even though the Senate should be in session.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Washington, I suggest two things:

First, this resolution simply restores the Senate to its natural condition. It does not prohibit committees from sitting during the sessions of the Senate, if they so desire, and if the Senate is willing that they shall so sit.

In the next place, there are other hours of the day than those in which the Senate is in session, or in which it may be sitting, in which it has been supposed in the past that committee work should be done. So solicitous have been the general parliamentary writers upon this subject that I find it stated in Jefferson's Manual, on page 85, that—

> So soon as the House sits, and a committee is notified of it, the chairman is in duty bound to rise instantly, and the Members to attend the service of the House.

I do not say that that would always be true; but we have passed a series of resolutions declaring that practically all the committees may sit during the sessions of the Senate, and for the last four weeks four or five of the great committees have been sitting almost constantly during the sessions of the Senate, with the result that even those who desired to attend the sessions of the Senate were not able to do so in view of their duties before these committees.

I hope the Senator from Washington will not object. Let us at least return to our normal situation, and then deal with the question as it may come up from time to time. Let us rescind this wholesale permission to be engaged in other work during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am in entire sympathy with the general spirit expressed by the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, Mr. President; but I will ask that it go over for consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. That, of course, is within the Senator's rights. I simply wish to say before I sit down that under the objection of the Senator from Washington I shall find it necessary to do whatever I can—it may be little, or it may be nothing—to prevent carrying out the suggestion made, as I understand, last night in the Democratic caucus that instead of adjourning each evening a recess shall be taken, because if a recess were taken to-night until to-morrow, with these bills under consideration, the resolution would not appear until the next adjournment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Washington will not ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow. I think it is highly important that the resolution should be adopted, and I only asked for time in order to bring it to the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], who, I knew, had a special committee that he desired to have exempted from the operation of this proposed order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I quite agree with the construction placed by the Senator from Iowa upon the rules of the Senate, or, rather, upon the statements found in Jefferson's Manual, which is a part of the rules of the Senate.

There is a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, consisting of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and myself, who have been holding hearings upon Senate resolution No. 291, commonly known as the coal investigation, to find out whether or not certain charges were true to the effect that the South Atlantic ports are discriminated against by the so-called Coal Trust. This subcommittee notified those interested upon both sides of the question that we would begin hearings on the 20th of this month. A large number of people have come to Washington to attend those hearings. The sessions began promptly on the 20th, and we have been holding sessions twice a day, beginning in the morning at 10 o'clock and suspending at 12, when the Senate convened, taking up the work again at 3 and continuing until 5 o'clock. The committee, of course, will yield to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we were to make an exception in this resolution of the subcommittee to which the Senator from Florida has referred—and upon the showing that has been made by the Senator from Florida and other Senators I should feel inclined to do so—would that remove the objection of the Senator from Florida and the objection of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRYAN. I believe the Senator would be justified in that. We have obtained a committee room, not on the same floor as the Senate Chamber, but immediately by the Senate Chamber, so that we can be reached at a moment's notice. The investigation is quite important, it seems to me, and, again, it does not seem fair to the people who have come here from a distance upon a notice of the Senate before they have been given an opportunity to be heard to discontinue the hearings.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am willing that an exception be put into the resolution I have offered. I ask the Secretary to write into it as an amendment the words "except the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs."

Mr. BRYAN. I suggest to the Senator to say "except the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs now considering Senate resolution 291."

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. That will satisfy me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator might except the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that committee sits very often during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not like to object to the request of the Senator from Iowa, but the Committee on Foreign Relations has been conducting an inquiry in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, and I dislike to feel that that committee must come to the Senate and ask for further authority to pursue their investigation. That inquiry relates to a proposed treaty with Nicaragua; and, in my opinion, it is very important to ascertain our exact relations with that impoverished country. I do not know how much further progress will be made in the investigation, but if the object of this resolution is to obtain the presence of Senators on the floor of the Senate instead of their attendance upon committee work—and, of course, it is a very worthy object; no one can deny that—committee work will suffer during the hours of the Senate sessions, while the attendance upon the floor will not be more numerous than before. We have spent three or four days in the discussion of the river and harbor bill. The Senate has listened to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has delivered a most intelligent and creditable speech, but we who sat upon the subcommittee with the honored Senator from Ohio are not lacking in the information which the Senator from Ohio is now giving to the Senate. There is no reason why we should be prevented from other service in order to listen to that discussion.

I do not believe that the purpose of the Senator from Iowa will be realized. I should like to help him secure a larger attendance of Senators upon the floor, but I do not believe this plan will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not presenting this as a personal matter. I do not want any help from the Senator from Michigan. So far as my own work is concerned, I am presenting it as a matter of public policy. I supposed that it was the business of Senators to be present when the proposed legislation is debated and disposed of. I assumed that the work of a committee was preliminary to the work of the Senate. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not look upon this as any personal request. I have no greater interest in it than he or any other Senator has who desires good legislation.

I have said all I want about it. If there is objection to the resolution, it must go over; if there is not, I want a vote upon it.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Michigan what particular investigation he has in his mind that he wishes reserved?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] is chairman, is now working on the investigation of the coal railroad discrimination in the South, and we are working from 10 o'clock in the morning until 5 o'clock in the afternoon, taking only a short recess in the middle of the day for our other work.

Mr. LEWIS. I may be in error, but I had understood that that had been excepted from the resolution as a conclusion of the conference on this side with the Senator from Iowa. Am I incorrect in that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the Senator is correct. He asked me what committees are now working under the authority of the Senate. The other committee is the Committee on Foreign Relations, which has before it a resolution adopted by the Senate authorizing an investigation into Nicaraguan affairs. That committee has proceeded up to the present time during the hours the Senate has been sitting. It has been temporarily laid aside because there seems to be nothing before the committee to challenge our immediate attention, but if the treaty with Nicaragua should be sent here the inquiry will be promptly revived with vigilance and care; and I do not wish to be precluded from pursuing such an investigation by the adoption of a resolution of this character.

Furthermore, it has been intimated that under the policy adopted by the Democratic caucus last night—and I know nothing about it, except what I have heard on the floor—we are to proceed to recess from day to day, rather than adjourn, as is usual. Am I right about that? And it is said if the resolution is not adopted now, there will be no opportunity for it to be heard in the morning hour hereafter.

Mr. President, it is very easy to maintain a morning hour for routine morning business. The only thing necessary to do is to move an adjournment, and in the absence of a quorum the Senate can not recess; adjournment will be the only motion which can be made; the morning hour will come up automatically. I do not think there will be any serious trouble in observing the morning hour.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned I am not in accord with the policy of the majority, determined by their caucus, which seeks to hold before the Senate any special bill to the exclusion of other bills, and I do not propose to aid the other side in any way by my vote or presence.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say if the Senator feels that there will be a morning hour, and therefore he will have complete opportunity for anything he would desire to discuss during the morning hour, there is no embarrassment. If, on the other hand, there were not a morning hour, and the Senator had some particular special matter he desired to present, I am sure he could rely on the courtesy of the Senate to allow him to entertain whatever he presented. Therefore I can see no obstruction to the resolution from that viewpoint.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to be understood as favoring the plan to recess from day to day. I stated it because I read it in this morning's papers as one of the things favored by the caucus of the majority last night. I am very anxious that this resolution shall be voted upon.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object to the present consideration of the resolution, and ask that it go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope we may adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa. I think there is a feeling on both sides that there is certain legislation here that should be enacted before we adjourn. I think there is also a feeling that we ought to adjourn as soon as we possibly can. I believe that nothing would conduce more to facilitating this legislation and an early adjournment than action by this body which will stop the sitting of committees during the sessions. I trust the resolution may pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, joining with the Senator from North Carolina in his expressed desire that we should secure an early adjournment, I will ask the Senator if he, psychologically or otherwise, can suggest to us the probable time of final adjournment if we are all very industrious?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator is asking me if I can suggest a probable time for final adjournment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; approximately.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not, Mr. President. The Senator knows as well as I do, and one Senator here knows as well as any other Senator, the difficulties that we have under our rules even when we are all ever so anxious to proceed expeditiously. If there is no filibustering in any direction, I had hoped for early action on all these measures; but if there is no filibustering on the trust and trade-commission bills, and after they are passed there is still filibustering on the river and harbor bill, or if the present filibuster on that bill is renewed, then, of course, that would greatly extend the length of time that we would have to stay here and suffer, because I think a majority of the Senators have made up their minds that there will be no final adjournment of Congress until the river and harbor bill has been passed, as well as these other bills.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to ask whether the objection is still urged by the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Washington against the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I insist on my objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made and the resolution will go over. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

STATUE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON GLICK.

Mr. THOMPSON. I submit a concurrent resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 30), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of the late George Washington Glick 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 shall be for use and distribution by the governor of Kansas; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed an engraving of said statue to accompany said proceedings, said engraving to be paid for out of the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the concurrent resolution may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the conference report on House bill 17824, the general deficiency appropriation bill, may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the report be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, there is but one matter in the conference report to which I desire to call attention, and that is in regard to the amendment which was proposed by my colleague [Mr. WARREN] and which was adopted by the Senate, making an increased appropriation for the fish hatchery at Saratoga, Wyo. It seems that the conferees in their wisdom have seen fit to strike from the bill this amendment.

The situation is a little peculiar. An appropriation was made some years ago for a hatchery at that point. Much of the land was in private ownership, and the acquiring of title took up time and required more money than was anticipated at the beginning. The consequence is that the work has dragged and there is an insufficient amount at present, according to the Secretary of Commerce, to put the institution on the basis which it ought to attain.

It occurs to me that in these times of rising prices, especially of food products, and in the failure of our hopes and expectations that under the recent tariff legislation the cost of living would be reduced, the Government ought to use every means in its power to increase the food supply, and fish is becoming a very important food supply. I notice in the morning papers the congratulations upon Congress for providing free fish wharves here, because they would result in reducing the cost to the consumer of one of the principal necessities of daily life.

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to antagonize the adoption of the conference report, but I wish to call attention to the fact that this amendment was made directly upon the request and at the suggestion of the Secretary of Commerce, which appears in a letter printed at page 13440 of the RECORD, when this bill was under discussion. I can only express my regret that the conferees have seen fit not only to halt the necessary work upon this project but to retard still further the hope that the people of the United States have entertained that there might be some reduction in the cost of living through an increase in the quantity of food products.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with the deficiency items in this appropriation bill I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some other things that may in the future cause greater deficiencies than are shown in this bill. I call attention to the imports and exports for the month of June, 1914, and compare them with the imports and exports for the month of June, 1913. The total imports for the month of June, 1914, were $157,772,973; for June, 1913, they were $131,245,877, or an increase of imports for the month of June, 1914, over the month of June, 1913, of $26,527,096.

The total exports for June, 1914, were $157,119,451; for June, 1913, they were $163,404,916, a decrease of $6,285,465 for the month of June, 1914, as compared with June, 1913.

The exports and imports together for the month of June, 1914, as compared with June, 1913, show a loss to the commerce of our country of $32,812,561. The effect of the Democratic tariff was not materially felt until April, 1914, as orders could not be placed by American importers and goods made and shipped by the foreign manufacturers much before that date.

I now call attention to the total loss to our commerce by the increased importations and decreased exportations for the months of April, May, and June, 1914, as compared with the same months of the year 1913:

Loss for April, $63,890,849; loss for May, $63,562,901; loss for June, $32,812,561, or a total for the three months of $160,266,311.

What a wonderful difference it would have made to American workmen and to American business if this vast amount of merchandise had been made by the unemployed of our country. The month of July, according to the statement of the United States Treasury, dated July 18, 1914, bids fair to be as disastrous as the preceding months, for I see the custom receipts, notwithstanding the great decrease in the rates of duty, are greater than for the same period of July, 1913.

I have a list of the imports of merchandise in May, 1914, compared with May, 1913, covering 27 classes of goods. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Imports of merchandise in May, 1914, compared with May, 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. I now want to call the attention of the Senate to the total value of imports and exports of the United States for the 12 months ending June 30, 1914, as compared with the 12 months ending June 30, 1913. Total imports, free and dutiable, for the fiscal year 1914, $1,894,169,180; total imports, free and dutiable, for the fiscal year 1913, $1,813,008,234, an increased importation for the fiscal year 1914 of $81,160,946. Total exports, domestic and foreign, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, $2,465,884,149; total exports, domestic and foreign, for the fiscal year 1914, $2,364,626,555, a decrease in exports for the fiscal year 1914, of $101,257,594—a total loss to our commerce by increased importations and decreased exportations of $182,418,540.

Senators will notice that out of a total loss to our commerce for the year ending June 30, 1914, of $182,418,540, the greater part of it, namely, $160,266,311, occurred during the months of April, May, and June, 1914. What stronger condemnation could be made against the Democratic tariff bill than these facts, furnished us by the published statements of our Department of Commerce? A kind Providence has vouchsafed to our country an unprecedented crop, and at a time when other countries are suffering from a shortage. Mother earth has yielded to the American husbandmen her richest blessings, and let us hope that this will prevent disaster to our business life and want and suffering to our laboring people.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not know it was the purpose of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to enter into a tariff discussion this morning, and I hesitate to take up the time of the Senate when I know Senators are so anxious to begin the consideration of other legislation, in which the country is deeply interested, in replying to that Senator, but I feel it is proper I should give the Senator some facts in connection with our import and export trade.

The Senator from Utah has referred to the increase in imports during the last two or three months. In a statement issued only a few days ago by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, it was shown that the increase in the imports during the last few months is due largely to an increase in the importation of food products, and that the increase in the importation of manufactured products ready for consumption has been relatively small. As is explained by the Secretary of Commerce in this very illuminating statement, which he has issued and given to the public, that that increase in food products was to supply a deficiency of these products in this country, resulting from the fact that last year we had short crops and a falling off in the domestic meat supply.

This increase in the importations of food products has not, because of the scarcity in this country, reduced the price to any considerable extent of the food products here. There has been a great deal of talk about the increase in the importation of corn and of meat products, but because of the short supply of those products that importation has not resulted in an appreciable reduction in the price of those products in this country.

I do not think from any standpoint there can be ground for serious criticisms of an increase in imports when it does not affect the price of products here; but from the Democratic standpoint, whenever the price of any product in this country is unreasonably high we welcome imports. One of the objects and purposes in the reduction of duties by the Democratic Party was that, when American producers were exacting of American consumers unreasonable prices for their products, the doors might be thrown open in order that consumers might get the necessaries of life at more reasonable prices.

Mr. President, there has been some slight falling off in the amount of exports in the last few months. It is well known to every man of common knowledge that the purchasers of our exported products are foreigners. When we export anything from this country to a foreign country we sell it to foreigners. If the financial condition of the foreign countries to which we export our products is bad, if the business situation there is depressed, it affects the purchasing power of our customers. When you find a falling off of exports from this country, in view of the well-organized arrangements of the producers of the staple products in this country for the exploitation of foreign markets, it is not to be attributed to any condition that exists in this country; it is not to be attributed to any tariff legislation; it is not to be attributed to any policy of the administration; it is to be attributed to the conditions that prevail in the countries where we sell those products.

The fact that our exports have fallen off is conclusive evidence of what the newspapers tell us, of what publicists tell us, of what the economists tell us, that in nearly every country in the world to-day there is a condition of business depression very much greater than any that has recently existed in this country, even taking the pessimistic views of those who advocate protection and who attribute all evils that come to us, whether they come through Providence or from other sources, to the abolition of the Republican prohibitory protective tariff system.

Mr. President, the Senator has given us some figures with reference to imports, intended to show that the increase of importations in recent months is due to the passage of the Democratic tariff bill. The Senator would have the country believe that the increase in imports is entirely due to this legislation and because of alleged cheaper production abroad. The Senator ignores the well-known fact that this increase is largely of food products, and to supply a deficiency here caused by short crops, and so forth. Further, the Senator forgets the fact that our import trade has been progressive under all administrations and under all tariffs. I say to the Senator from Utah, if he contends that this increase in imports in recent months is the result of the Democratic tariff law and that that increase has robbed the laboring men of this country of jobs, that if he will take the imports that have followed the tariff legislation of his party and apply the same theory and logic he will find that the number of jobs that have been lost to workmen, if any, as the result of the increase in imports is many per cent less under the Democratic tariff law than under the Payne-Aldrich law and under the Dingley law.

Now, let me give the Senate some figures in regard to that. I will go back just one year, but I will go back far enough, Mr. President, to get within the purview and limitations of the Payne-Aldrich law, a law for which the Senator from Utah has always stood sponsor; a law which he thinks is an ideal tariff law; a law to which he wants the country to return and which he thinks is the panacea for all political, industrial, and commerical ills. Let us see what was the increase of imports under that law. The total imports under the Payne-Aldrich law in the fiscal year 1912 were $1,653,226,934. In the fiscal year 1913, just one year afterwards, under the operation of the Payne-Aldrich law the imports amounted to $1,813,008,234, an increase under the Payne-Aldrich law in importations of foreign products, in one year, of $159,744,300.

Now let us compare the years 1913 and 1914, during the first of which we had the Payne-Aldrich law, and during 11 months of the latter we had the present Democratic tariff law. In 1913 the imports were $1,813,008,234; in 1914, covering 9 months of the Democratic tariff law, the total imports were $1,894,169,180, an increase under the new tariff law in importations in one year of $81,000,000, as against an increase under the Payne-Aldrich law in the previous year of $159,000,000; in other words, a falling off in imports in one year under the Democratic tariff of $78,000,000.

Let me put these figures in percentages, Mr. President. The increase in imports from 1912 to 1913 under the Payne-Aldrich law was 9⅝ per cent; the increase in 1913 to 1914 under the Democratic tariff, put in percentages, was 4.4 per cent; so that the increase in imports for the year 1913 over the year 1912 under Republican tariff was 9⅝ per cent, as against a 4.4 per cent increase for the fiscal year 1914 under the Democratic tariff law over the year 1913, or an increase of about twice as much under the operation of the Payne law, in one year, as under the operation of the Democratic tariff law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But there was a larger domestic business then.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am referring to imports.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in this connection I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to a statement from the New York Evening Post, which I caused to be inserted in the RECORD yesterday, which is designed to show that a comparison of the exports of 1914 with those of 1913 alone is misleading, and that when those comparisons are carried further back it is demonstrated that the amount of the falling off in exports between those two years is comparatively small as compared with the different percentages in the falling off between the exports of 1914 and the exports of years previous to 1913. It is a very instructive article.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire to put that in the RECORD?

Mr. THOMAS. It was inserted in the RECORD yesterday, and I was only calling the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, Mr. President, that is all I care to say about this matter of imports. If the increase in the imports of this country results in depriving labor of work, as the Senator from Utah says, then, according to the statistical figures which I have given here and which can not be disputed, the imports under the Payne-Aldrich law during the two previous years caused a great deal more falling off and deprivation of jobs than has been caused since then under the Democratic law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. But let me proceed, Mr. President. We are very familiar with the argument that was made with respect to imports when this tariff bill was up for consideration. We were told that we would be flooded with imports, and the countries from which we were told these imports would come were the manufacturing countries, not the agricultural countries. Nobody doubted our ability to protect ourselves when we made a good crop against the agricultural countries. Nobody raised very seriously the question of our ability to protect ourselves against these agricultural imports. The argument was confined mainly to the general proposition that Germany and Great Britain and France and Belgium and other countries in Europe could manufacture products so much cheaper than we could that if we made these reductions in duties our markets would be invaded and inundated with these foreign manufactured products.

Now, the fact is, entirely in line with the argument which I have just made, and supporting the statement which I have just made, that these importations were largely food products to supply a demand caused by the bad crops in this country—the increase in imports that the Senator refers to in the last few months, and which I admit has come very largely from the agricultural countries and not from the manufacturing countries, especially not from the manufacturing countries of Europe. There has been hardly any change either in the import or the export situation between this country and Europe since the passage of the tariff act.

To bear out that statement I want to read a few official figures, and then I shall conclude. I have much more that I should like to say in this connection, but in the interest of time, and not to trespass upon the Senate when it wants to proceed to something else, I want simply to read the statistics of imports and exports between this country and Europe since the passage of this act, and then I shall conclude.

Imports from Great Britain for 11 months ending May, 1913, $275,362,605.. Imports from Great Britain for 11 months ending May, 1914—this year—$268,910,041.

Imports from Great Britain have fallen off. Great Britain was the country, the great manufacturing center, the home of pauper labor, which, according to protectionist argument, was to engulf us with its cheap products; and yet there has been a falling off of more than $6,000,000 of imports under our Democratic tariff.

Exports to Great Britain during 11 months ending May, 1913, $565,851,978. Exports to Great Britain during 11 months ending May, 1914, $557,837,521, a falling off in our exports to Great Britain of less than $8,000,000.

Here are the figures for all of Europe, embracing the great manufacturing countries of the world; the countries from which we had the most to dread, according to protectionists; the countries that were to come upon us like a mighty army and sweep away our factories, to take away the jobs of our laboring men. All of Europe—imports for eleven months ending May, 1913, $829,842,558. Imports from all of Europe for 11 months ending May, 1914, $826,430,748, a falling off of $3,412,000 in imports from all of Europe.

I am talking now about the first 11 months of these years, and not the whole fiscal year; the first 11 months of this year compared with the like number of months of last year. We have not yet the figures for the entire fiscal year of 1914.

Now, take the exports. Exports to all of Europe for these 11 months, 1913, $1,397,985,962. For the same 11 months of 1914, exports to all of Europe, $1,396,187,935.

Expressed in billions and in millions, there was exactly the same export trade between this country and Europe during the 11 months just past and the 11 months of the fiscal year ending June, 1913.

From these figures it appears that our imports from Great Britain for the 11 months ending May, 1914, were $6,000,000 less than for the same months in 1913, and our imports from all of Europe were likewise $3,400,000 less in 1914 than in 1913, while our exports to Europe were almost precisely the same for the same period of time.

As I said, Mr. President, some time before this Congress adjourns I desire to review this whole situation, but everybody recognizes that this is not the time. I apologize to the Senate for saying this much to-day, and I would not have done it but for the fact that the Senator from Utah made the statement that he did.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, no Member of this body is more anxious than I am that this session shall close. I acted as a member of the committee of conference on the bill that is before the Senate, and I want to see it agreed to as speedily as possible. Notwithstanding that, however, I shall take a few minutes to put in the RECORD one or two facts that I think it is important should be placed in that publication, in view of what has transpired this morning.

The fact is, we all need a rest. There is not a Member in this Chamber, nor a Member of this body outside of the Chamber, who does not want to get home and who ought not to be permitted to go home. The President of the United States to-day ought to be breathing the health-giving ozone of the mountains and lakes of New Hampshire instead of the superheated atmosphere of Washington. We ought to adjourn as speedily as possible.

A few days ago I took from a former Democratic paper an item that interested me. It is headed:

GIVING CONGRESS ITS HAT.

It is chronicled of the evil King Jehoram that "he departed without being desired." This will be written in the history of the United States of the Congress that has prostrated business and is persisting at its task. Never has there been a Congress that so thoroughly vindicated the principle of the recall, that has so abundantly earned the condemnation of the undesired king.

But why should this Congress tarry in overheated Washington to add yet more to the discouragement of industry and the demoralization of commerce? Why should the eminent statesmen expose themselves to the torrid climate of Washington till they see the ashes of prosperity scattered on the waters?

The Nation to-day stands in the attitude of the bored and disgusted host, saying to the Congress fervently and with unaffected urgency, "Here's your hat! What's your hurry?"

I also clipped from the New York Tribune a few days ago an article headed "Not patriotism, but cowardice." The Tribune says:

It is not patriotism, but political cowardice, which keeps Congress in session at Washington. The leader of the majority in the House wants to quit. Five-sixths of his followers want to quit. Yet because the President has cracked the lash the weary toilers mechanically keep on toiling. They have no interest in their work, and the country has no interest in it.

Mr. President, that has been demonstrated over and over again during the past week, when we had to spend 15, 20, and sometimes 30 minutes in the middle of the day to secure a quorum of this body. The Senate has had no interest in its work; the Senators want to get away from Washington; and, in my opinion, the sooner Congress adjourns the better it will be for the country. The Tribune continues:

The only effect of the passage of the antitrust bills now pending in the Senate would be to surround with new uncertainties all prosecutions under the Sherman law and to retard further the recovery of business. There is no patriotism involved in muddling up a situation which had been almost completely clarified and further delaying the return of prosperity.

Nearly everybody about Washington except President Wilson sees this. He sets up his opinion against that of the Democrats in Congress and calls their surrender to him an act of patriotism. It is something to their credit that they are loath to accept as such what he has described as a decoration of honor. If there is nothing better and higher in patriotism than subserviency to a party leader, there would be no sting for anybody in going down in history as a man without a country.

Mr. President, I do not at this time intend to go into a discussion of the question that was raised by the Senator from Utah, and which has been replied to so vehemently by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, I have a little clipping here that might be of interest right along the line of those which he has just read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be pleased to have the Senator put it in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. It is an account of an interview with Senator WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, and is dated at Atlantic City.

JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, United States Senator from Mississippi, is authority for the statement that the Democratic majority at Washington is worn out, peevish, and utterly weary of the work President Wilson has cut out for it, but determined to go through with the task if it takes months, instead of weeks, to come.

* * * * * * *

"We have gone so far that it would be suicidal to stop," he said this afternoon. "Months of discomfort and strain, particularly during the warm weather, have reduced many of the Senators to a condition which precludes the sanest and best work, but the only thing possible now is to go ahead."

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, Mr. President, everybody agrees to that in private conversation; but it is a little surprising to me that any Democratic Senator has openly announced the opinions which he so freely gives to his colleagues in the Senate in private conversation.

Mr. JONES. That was what surprised me, and that is the reason I thought it would be well to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to say that I have noted the fact that the Senator from North Carolina says that he intends to discuss matters relating to tariff legislation at length before the adjournment of this session. I hope it will be before snow flies, because some of us would like to get home and look over our farms and get acquainted with our constituents; but whenever it may be I shall doubtless be here, and will then take the opportunity to put in the RECORD many facts that I have in my possession, and a great many more that I shall accumulate between now and that time.

For the present I am going to content myself with placing in the RECORD, without reading, if the Senate will give me permission, a letter from the Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County, Pa., showing the condition of industrial affairs in that county, which I commend to the Senator from North Carolina and his Democratic associates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF MONTGOMERY COUNTY,
Norristown, Pa., July 17, 1914.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The purpose of this letter is to lay before you, as President of the United States and leader of the political party now in power, the existing business conditions of those manufactories and other industries which make up the Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County, Pa.

This association represents industries which lie in that part of the Schuylkill Valley covered by the county named, which county is adjacent to Philadelphia. It does not embrace all the industries in this county. It is, however, representative, and whatever is said of the conditions of the factories, etc., of this association applies with equal force to all other like industries hereabouts. It is a general condition that is here set forth.

Under existing circumstances we feel it to be our duty in this most unusual way to lay certain facts before you, and to lay these facts before you for the reason that if any relief is to come, so far as we can see, that relief must come through you. If there is no relief, then the outlook is nothing less than frightening.

In a great measure that part of the Schuylkill Valley for which we now speak is industrially paralyzed. Appalling as that statement is, it does not exaggerate real conditions. We might lay before you an elaborate statistical plan showing just how many hours in the week many of our factories have curtailed; we might in this way show you just what the percentage of loss of wages to the workpeople is; we might work out for your easy reading what the individual losses aggregate to a given group as compared with this time one year ago. We content ourselves, however, with the broad statement—a statement based on facts quite within our control and always ready for your inspection—that such are the conditions here now that should these conditions become permanent, it would mean the annihilation of many of these industries and all the consequences which such disaster would carry with it. If these conditions are not improved, they mean destruction. It is in the presence of this impending ruin that this letter is written.

We would not bring this situation in this public way to your attention were we not convinced that you have the power to give, in some measure at least, the relief we ask and to which we are entitled. Mark, please, the relief to which we are entitled. We are not asking a favor. We are seeking to avoid a calamity. We have been told that we are asking too much of human nature to suggest a modification of the tariff law so lately passed by the party now in power and which became a law over your willing signature. We dare submit, however, that when a law like that under trial shows that it brings relief neither in the direction of lower prices of the things we eat nor increased opportunity for labor in the things which we make, when, in fact, its operation proves that it closes down much of the machinery in our own country, and to this extent increases the importation of goods of this same kind produced abroad, when, we say, a law in operation proves itself to be that kind of a cruelty to both capital and labor, then the splendid opportunity does arise for the party in power to acknowledge its mistake and reverse its error. No finer opportunity ever presented itself to any political party to rise above partisanship and serve the people than is now offered the Democratic Party to so modify the present tariff law as to give both capital and labor a decent chance in the country in which that Democratic Party boasts that it is the servant of the people. Some of our friends say it is useless to ask such a thing. They tell us that in anger you will rebuke us for making such a suggestion. If we were trifling, if we were not in dead earnest, if we were writing this letter merely as critics of your administration, then we might be met in this spirit. But when we are standing in the presence of capital jeopardized, in the presence of suffering and want, in the presence of idle men and women who pray for work and who can not get it, because of the tariff law which your party has passed and you have signed with pleasure, then we will not hesitate to say that under such circumstances as these the President of the United States falls far below the standard of his high office when, as the servant of the people, he meets their appeal in either anger or indifference. We say now and here that the Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County, Pa., does ask that this law be modified, and modified now, by the party in power, which made the serious mistake of forcing it upon us for even a short time. That party under your leadership can do this. In this hour of the people's trial that party and its leader should do no less. They are the servants of the people.

We have more to say. We need relief from some impending legislation which, according to the public press, you now propose to have enacted before the present Congress adjourns. It is difficult to describe to you the effect which this impending legislation has upon that part of the country which we represent and for which we now speak. No word better describes it than fright. It is right that you should know this. It is right that you should know that men are asking, Is capital to be tabooed? Are successful business men to be declassed as citizens and classified as malefactors? Is the law to say to one class of citizens sabotag is lawful and to another class property is plunder? The feeling is abroad that malice and class hatred are being toyed with by our representatives at Washington. Men are frightened as never before in the history of this Nation. They tremble for their country. They fear the cause of the depression is more dangerous than the effect. Men bear to you the tidings, so it is said, that there is no depression, men are not out of work, the country suffers from nothing but "calamity howlers." Our answer is this: In the Schuylkill Valley there is depression; the streets of the Schuylkill Valley towns are lined with men who have no work who one year ago were well employed; the floors of the Schuylkill Valley warehouses are piled with goods, for which there is no market and no demand. We speak only for the Schuylkill Valley, but for that we do speak. When any man rises in your presence to tell you, as President of our country, that these men in the Schuylkill Valley can work if they will, that the work is here, and that they are crying out merely to discredit your administration, that all this talk about depression is due to an inflamed imagination, then we rise to say that that man, whoever he may be, is guilty of mockery that is exquisitely cruel.

It is said that all we need is confidence. True. That is just what we now come to you for. Confidence. Speak the word. Tell us that no bill brought before you which discriminates between capital and labor will meet with your approval. Tell us that all so-called trust legislation shall meet with your disapproval and your veto until such time as the country has had opportunity to recover from the shock of laws already passed and full time to weigh well new laws now pending. Tell us that you do not share the feeling of those who would heckel the so-called "vested interest" and destroy the property of the other man by legislative enactment. Tell us that you do not believe that hospitals and colleges and charitable institutions which are accepting support from funds provided by those who made that money in "big business" are accepting unholy help. Tell us that you believe the pension offered by the "American millionaire" to old and honorable educators may be money honestly gathered by decent methods. Tell us that legal vandalism is as horrible to you as any other form of anarchy. Tell us these things. Say them out loud where the people can hear you. Say them straight and clear and without equivocation or reservation. Do this and modify the tariff and there will flow over this land a wave of that kind of confidence that will from that day mean prosperity to all the people. We need confidence. We come to Washington to get it. We have nowhere else to go. It can be had at no other place. It can be had there, and we come there to get it. The issue is squarely before you.

In the name of unremunerated capital, in the name of honest, independent labor, in the name of every man and woman whose comfort and happiness depends upon the general welfare of all the people, we do now and here ask that you say these things we have asked you to say. To say these things will show capital, and it will show labor, that we have a President who will set his face as flint against demagogy in all its subtle forms. That will restore confidence. It has been recently asked, editorially, by one of the great daily papers of this country:

"Of what value will any advice be to a man whose mind is made up? Mr. Wilson is open to no argument. He has marked out his path and declared his fixed intention to follow it to the end, whatever the result to the business of the country."

"Whatever the result to the business of the country!" If that be true, then this letter and the broad and best interests of both capital and labor behind this letter can receive no consideration at your hands. If that be true, then, as has been said, editorially, by another great and independent journal of this country, we stand face to face with that condition which can only mean that—

"The prestige of our manufacturers attained by such a gallant struggle is to be destroyed by those who neither understand its significance or realize its priceless value."

Sincerely, yours.

C. F. WILLIAMS,
President Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County.
W. W. FINN,
Secretary Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, it is with some diffidence that I put in the RECORD at this time the fact that the sum total of the calamity set forth to the Senate awhile ago by the Senator from Utah is about $167,000,000. Whether that was represented by the falling off of exports or imports, the one or the other, is not material. That is his charge. I want the Senate to know that by the report of a department of this Government that is short by 130-odd millions of the peculations from one great corporation in New England, to wit, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, to correct which we have three bills pending before the Senate now, reported from committees, regardless of party; and we say to the country that our bills will not only prevent that from occurring in the future, but they will punish those who are guilty of that kind of thing in the future.

The country therefore is presented with the question whether or not we shall filibuster and delay here in talking about the small matters, when the large matters immediately before us for correction are now before the country, and this side of the Chamber is asking the other side to allow us to pass the needed legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. If it were not for the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad situation, I do not know what Senators on the other side of the Chamber would talk about. It has no more to do with the industrial conditions in this country to-day than the contents of last year's almanac. The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. is to be attended to by the legal department of the United States Government, as I think it ought to be, unless a satisfactory adjustment can be made outside of the courts. But whatever course is pursued I am content, as a New England man, to let the corporation defend itself in any way it can.

Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is going to address the Senate, and we all want to hear him. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bryan	Chilton	Crawford
Bankhead	Burton	Clapp	Cummins
Borah	Camden	Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger
Brady	Catron	Clarke, Ark.	Hitchcock
Brandegee	Chamberlain	Colt	Hughes

Martin, Va.	Reed	Stone	White
Martine, N. J.	Saulsbury	Sutherland	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, in order that we may dispose of the conference report on the general deficiency bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate further insist on the one amendment, amendment numbered 158, that is in disagreement between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a letter that I have which has relation to matters which were discussed yesterday.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 23, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your telephone inquiry of this morning concerning the Senate amendments to the pending general deficiency bill for the public-building projects at Martinsburg, W. Va., and Spanish Fork, Utah, I beg to advise you as follows:

MARTINSBURG, W. VA.

This is an authorization for extending and remodeling, etc., the public building at this place, authorized in the public-building act of March 4, 1913, at a limit of cost of $20,000.

At the commencement of the present fiscal year—July 1, 1914—the Office of the Supervising Architect had before it authorized extensions and new buildings totaling $38,500,000 for construction work alone; that is to say, exclusive of the cost of land. Included in this total was over $6,000,000 worth of construction work authorized prior to the act of March 4, 1913.

The technical force employed in the Office of the Supervising Architect, which is now working at its maximum capacity, is able to place under contract each year work to the value of about $7,000,000. It therefore appears that this office has about one year's work ahead of it before it will commence upon any projects authorized in the act of March 4, 1913.

Under date of May 6, 1914, I transmitted to the Speaker of the House a letter (H. Doc. No. 907, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) setting forth the status of the public-building work and containing a list of projects authorized prior to the act of March 4, 1913, for which the plans and specifications would be prepared after July 1, 1914. The department feels that it is committed to this program, and the Office of the Supervising Architect is taking up each of the projects listed in the relative order stated.

In view of the fact that the Office of the Supervising Architect had ahead of it July 1 this year nearly five and one-half years' work, it became, of course, necessary to fix upon a plan which would determine the rotation in which various projects are placed under contract. The evident and equitable method of procedure is to take up the various projects according to the acts in which they are authorized. For this reason the buildings and extensions authorized in the act of March 4, 1913, will not be placed under contract until all prior authorizations have been taken care of.

Inasmuch as work on the bill of March 4, 1913, can not commence until about July 1, 1915, it is unnecessary at this time for Congress to appropriate for the authorized extension to the building at Martinsburg, W. Va. Any sums necessary for commencing this work may be carried in the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year 1916, which will probably pass about four months before work commences on the buildings authorized in the 1913 act.

It is noted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday Senator CHILTON'S statement that a department of the Government should not make the excuse that it is not ready to carry out the will of Congress. Without wishing to enter into any argument, I would be glad to assure the Senator that this is not the attitude of the Treasury Department, but that the inability to take up the Martinsburg project at this time is solely due to the fact that building authorizations have piled up far in excess of the annual capacity of the Office of the Supervising Architect. To appropriate for the Martinsburg project at this time would not mean that the department would give it special attention and advance it out of the place which has been equitably determined for it, unless the legislation carried with it a mandate requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to place this work under contract immediately, regardless of prior claims of projects authorized in earlier legislation.

I regret the necessity of such a lengthy explanation, but I am most anxious that both you and Senator CHILTON may understand that this department, instead of refusing to carry out the will of Congress, is most anxious to do so, but believes that it must not discriminate in carrying out the public-building program. For the reasons stated above, the department can not submit at this time an estimate for an appropriation for the work authorized to be undertaken in connection with the extension of the public building at Martinsburg, W. Va.

SPANISH FORK, UTAH.

July 17 the department transmitted to your committee a supplemental list of sites for public buildings upon which the department had received the recommendation of the Post Office Department. This list did not include any estimate for an appropriation for the site at Spanish Fork, Utah. Since the estimate was submitted the department has received from the Post Office Department the recommendations of the latter concerning other site projects. The department was willing to submit estimates for these further site projects, but upon inquiry of the House Committee on Appropriations was informed that the bill was closed. Among these latter site matters is that at Spanish Fork, Utah. If the appropriation is made at this time the department believes that it will be able to reach its decision and acquire a site. Nevertheless, to submit an estimate for this project only at this time and ignore the other sites to which reference has been made, would appear to be a discrimination which the department is desirous of avoiding. Nevertheless, should the conferees agree that the Spanish Fork item remain in the general deficiency bill, the department will not interpose any objection, as this matter is one in a very different position than the extension to the building at Martinsburg, W. Va.

Respectfully,

BYRON R. NEWTON,
Acting Secretary.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, by permission of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the hour of 6 o'clock arrives, the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana moves that when the hour of 6 o'clock arrives, the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the motion just made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is not debatable; but I beg to suggest to him that he ought not to make that motion this afternoon in view of the pendency of the resolution which I offered this morning.

Mr. KERN. I think there will be no trouble about unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know with regard to that.

Mr. KERN. I feel obliged to make the motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall feel compelled to ask for a roll call upon the motion if it is made now, although ordinarily I might not do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Indiana that if we are not going to have any morning business, if we are going to take a recess from day to day, I think the proper thing to do would be to prevent the introduction of any such business at any time, to have no morning business until the trust legislation is out of the way.

Mr. KERN. I have made the motion, and I feel that I must insist upon it, for it is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the roll is called, I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. What is the exigency that requires us to depart from the usual rule of adjourning and meeting at a given hour? There must be some reason for it.

Mr. REED. I can not yield for debate, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. Regular order!

Mr. KERN. It is not necessary that I answer the interrogatory of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ASHURST, and he answered in the affirmative.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to state to the Senator from New Hampshire that this is a motion that is not debatable, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think if the Chair will examine the rules, he will find that this is not a motion to take a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair construed it to be—a motion to take a recess.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a suggestion that when a certain hour arrives we then take a recess. This motion does not come under the rule which says that a motion to take a recess is not debatable. However, Mr. President, I have no disposition to delay the Senate, and with this suggestion will permit the roll to be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence, and in the absence of a transferee, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], and withhold my vote, unless it be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. Although under the liberal terms of that pair I often feel at liberty, when I may feel so disposed, to set aside the pair, this vote presenting more or less of a party question, I do not feel at liberty on it to disregard the pair. I therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which

I transfer to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN] and his pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. CATRON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I inquire if the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then, I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I think I ought, therefore, to withdraw my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I voted a little while ago because I thought he was in the Chamber. I now learn he is not. Therefore I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). On account of the absence of the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], with whom I have a pair, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], who was called away from the Chamber by illness.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but under its terms I can vote on such a question as this. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], to whom I transferred my pair, having entered the Chamber and voted, I now desire simply to announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 19, as follows:

So Mr. KERN's motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED resumed and concluded his speech, which entire is as follows:

Mr. President, lest I should forget it later on, I perhaps ought to say a preliminary word. I have recently discovered through the columns of a great newspaper that I was at one time a Republican. This paper apparently is disturbed lest I should return to that fold. It may be, Mr. President, that I was at one time a Republican, but if so it must have been in some prehistoric age, when I was previous to this existence upon this earth. I think it would be necessary to trace me back to the time when all life was limited to primordial protoplasm to discover that fact.

I have been accused of this supposed crime only very recently. If it will add to the peace of mind of the editorial writer, who has been exploiting his idea as a basis for editorial criticism, I will state to him that when I was 18 years of age I was engaged in canvassing my State for the Democratic State ticket; that from that time to this hour I have given my time and effort in every political campaign to the best of my very poor ability in favor of the Democratic Party; that my hand has never held a pencil that drew a scratch through the name of a Democrat printed upon a ticket. I may add that in 1896, when certain distinguished gentlemen and certain great newspapers were firing from the brush into the backs of the Democratic hosts, I was on the battle line just as an humble private, but as far as I had ability I was seeking to uphold the hands and the cause of the present Secretary of State.

The anxiety manifested in certain newspaper quarters, if not elsewhere, lest I should wander from the Democratic fold, is extremely interesting in view of the facts I have just related. Let me say here now, and say it with some emphasis, that I have not only always supported my ticket, but I have always supported my party platform. I have never been compelled to indulge in special pleadings to excuse myself for violating one plank by setting up the pretense that I am justified under another plank.

Mr. President, I am not surprised at these newspaper statements. I take them rather good naturedly than otherwise. The International Harvester Co. has many arms. It is only one of that pestiferous litter whelped in the Morgan offices. These are all united by the triple ties of consanguinity, affinity, and interest.

MONOPOLY.

Monopoly is a quagmire that has a common origin and a common bed. Touched at its circumference it quivers throughout its entire body. Shake it, and there will come crawling to the surface the foul beasts that inhabit its slime. Their heads will appear in concert, and their angry cries unite in an inharmonious chorus of malediction. Their cause is as much in common as was that of Ali Baba's Forty Thieves. Disturb the International and you arouse the Steel Trust. Awaken it, and you excite a chain of subsidiary companies. You start into activity the Standard Oil and all its allies are instantly upon the scene of action—a vast chain of banks, a measureless network of corporations, held together by illegal agreements and interlocking directorates. You arouse the malicious activity of every newspaper controlled by crooked business.

You may count upon the fact that, through the business agents of the International Harvester Co., the emissaries of the Steel Trust, and gentlemen of like ilk, there can be speedily produced for publication numerous interviews from business men, petitions from boards of trade, and especially plaintive supplications from "farmers" who are strangely interested in the welfare of the International Harvester Trust. We may therefore expect a flood of public opinion from this fountain source of purity to speedily engulf the Senate.

PRIVATE MONOPOLY IS INDEFENSIBLE.

As for myself, having always been a Democrat, believing in the fundamentals of that party, I stand here to-day to proclaim as of old that private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

"Private monopoly is indefensible." How familiar the phrase sounds! For 25 years it has been a cardinal doctrine of the Democratic faith. It has been a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, guiding the Democratic hosts from the valleys of defeat to the sunlit heights of victory. You can no more expurgate it from the philosophy of Democracy than you can obliterate the doctrine of the Trinity from the creed of Christianity. By a thousand solemn acts and convocations we are pledged to the extermination of monopoly.

All enemies of monopoly are fundamentally Democrats. All friends of monopoly are enemies of Democracy.

Those who create monopoly war against the Democratic Party. Those who perpetuate monopoly are as guilty as those who create it.

Those who honor monopolists give aid and comfort to the enemies of Democracy and the cause of human liberty.

"Private monopoly is indefensible." The expression finds its equivalent in the phrase "Private monopoly is criminal." Those who create, foster, and encourage that which is criminal are themselves criminals.

"Private monopoly is indefensible." The proposition has its corollary in the oft-repeated doctrine that those who organize or operate monopoly should be held personally responsible and be tried and condemned as criminals.

Respectability constitutes no excuse for crime. When education, learning, or great riches can be woven into a cloak to cover corrupt, criminal, and unlawful practices, justice is dead in the Republic.

When a man who pilfers from hunger or steals a trifle to supply a necessity is sent to jail and those who in the teeth of the law organize commercial marauding expeditions and plunder communities and entire States not only go unwhipped of justice but are crowned with offices and showered with honor, an evil day has arrived.

I do not believe in sending the man who steals a loaf of bread to jail and exalting those who rob a nation.

The reason monopoly has not been destroyed is because monopolists have been both powerful and respectable.

If money can not buy respect, it can purchase its counterfeit.

The golden calf still commands adoration.

Monopoly can not gain rights by prescription. Long-continued robbery does not ripen into a privilege. You can not steal long enough to make larceny a vested right. If you could, thievery would be an established and flourishing business.

A man who volunteers to serve on board a pirate ship with an already established criminal history may be worse than one who enlists with the original crew. The latter might have been deceived into the service. The former knows the gory record of the craft. He sees the black flag at the masthead. He steps upon decks slippery with the blood of the slaughtered. A gentleman of that kind knows what he is doing.

In the forum of morals there is no statute of limitations.

The commonest plea of the scoundrel is that he was beguiled by others. Adam invented that defense. It was not good when it was made, and it is not good now.

The executioner who during the French Revolution operated the guillotine could not shift his crime to Antoine Louis, the inventor of the instrument, nor be heard to say that prior to his employment the knife had already gathered a great harvest of innocent heads.

The man who helps to conduct the Harvester Trust can not escape responsibility by alleging that his sponsor and friend created it before he took service.

Moreover, a man who can not determine whether the practices of a monopoly are illegal until the question has been decided by the courts is too much in need of advice to place in a position requiring great discretion and independent judgment. Even a burglar is willing to admit his wrong after he has been advised by a court and duly sentenced to the penitentiary. The looters of the New Haven Railroad, if tried and convicted, will probably admit they have to stop operations.

The Missouri doctrine, "Show me," finds its extremest illustration in the gentlemen who can only be convinced by the decree of a court. The man who can not distinguish the illegality of an act until the judge is ready to impose sentence ought to be compelled to attend a school of morals.

Some people never can discern anything clearly until they see it through the bars of a jail. Even then they could not recognize their own wrong as readily as they could a kit of tools with which to saw their way out.

Here is a bit of interesting Jones testimony illustrating my thought. I quote:

I know of no practices of the company after I became a director that I thought in any way in contravention of law or good morals.

Here are the facts:

In 1912 the International Harvester Co. sold 111,447 binders, while the total sales of its competitors were only 19,535 machines.

In face of this fact, the witness was unable to see that he was connected with a monopoly.

This is the evidence and the charge in the Government's petition, and yet with it staring the witness in the face he answered:

You asked me whether I entirely approve of them—

The practices and policies of this company—

I say that that question is to-day pending before the courts, and if the courts say that that was an improper organization, I shall be prepared to say that I think so, too.

Observe that nothing can convince this gentleman that the Harvester Trust is a monopoly save the judgment of a court.

Mr. President, being a member of the Democratic Party and coming from the State of Missouri, I feel a little pride in the record of my State with reference to all matters concerning the prosecution of trusts and combinations. We have not been laggards, but have from the first been on the battle field. We have a somewhat satisfactory and distinguished record. I challenge attention to a few incidents. I desire later to put in the RECORD certain of the platform declarations of my State. But first let me quote the national platforms. In 1884 the Democratic Party declared against trusts and combinations. It reads:

While we favor all legislation which will tend to the equitable distribution of property, to the prevention of monopoly, and to the strict enforcement of individual rights against corporate abuses, we hold that the welfare of society depends upon a scrupulous regard for the right of property as defined by law.

The Republican platform in 1888 contained the following language:

We declare our opposition to all combinations of capital, organized in trusts or otherwise, to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens; and we recommend to Congress and the State legislatures, in their respective jurisdictions, such legislation as will prevent the execution of all schemes to oppress the people by undue charges on their supplies, or by unjust rates for the transportation of their products to market. We approve the legislation by Congress to prevent alike unjust burdens and unfair discriminations between the States.

The Democratic platform in 1898 contained this language:

Trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, as evils of the greatest magnitude and as organizations of this kind, not only continue to exist, but multiply in numbers, in defiance of law and public sentiment, we demand such laws, both State and national, as will certainly result in suppressing them.

In 1900 the Republicans and Democrats adopted platforms denouncing the trusts.

Democratic national platform, 1900:

"We pledge the Democratic Party to an unceasing warfare in Nation, State, and city against private monopoly in every form. Existing laws against trusts must be enforced and more stringent ones must be enacted providing for publicity as to the affairs of corporations engaged in interstate commerce, requiring all corporations to show, before doing business outside the State of their origin, that they have no water in their stock, and that they have not attempted and are not attempting to monopolize any branch of business or the production of any article of merchandise; and the whole constitutional power of Congress over interstate commerce, the mails, and all modes of interstate communication shall be exercised by the enactment of comprehensive laws upon the subject of trusts."

Republican national platform, 1900:

"We recognize the necessity and propriety of the honest cooperation of capital to meet new business conditions, and especially to extend our rapidly increasing foreign trade; but we condemn all conspiracies and combinations intended to restrict business, to create monopolies, to limit production, or to control prices, and favor such legislation as will effectively restrain and prevent all such abuses, protect and promote competition, and secure the rights of producers, laborers, and all who are engaged in industry and commerce."

In 1906 the Democratic platform again denounced the trusts. In 1908 this language was employed:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. Among the additional remedies we specify three: First, a law preventing a duplication of directors among competing corporations; second, a license system which will, without abridging the right of each State to create corporations, or its right to regulate as it will foreign corporations doing business within its limits, make it necessary for a manufacturing or trading corporation engaged in interstate commerce to take out a Federal license before it shall be permitted to control as much as 25 per cent of the products in which it deals, the license to protect the public from watered stock and to prohibit the control by such corporation of more than 50 per cent of the total amount of any product consumed in the United States; and, third, a law compelling such licensed corporations to sell to all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms, after making the allowance for the cost of transportation.

The Republican platform of that year praised President Roosevelt for the prosecution of illegal trusts and monopolies:

The greatest accomplishments of President Roosevelt have been, first and foremost, a brave and impartial enforcement of the law, the prosecution of illegal trusts and monopolies, the exposure and punishment of evildoers in the public service, the more effective regulation of the rates and services of the great transportation lines—

And so forth.

The Republican Party passed the Sherman antitrust law over Democratic opposition and enforced it after Democratic dereliction. It has been a wholesome instrument for good in the hands of a wise and fearless administration; but experience has shown that its effectiveness can be strengthened and its real objects better obtained by such amendments as will give the Federal Government greater supervision and control over, and greater publicity in, the management of that class of corporations engaged in interstate commerce having power and opportunity to effect monopolies.

In 1912 the Democratic platform contained this:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

* * * * * * *

We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the undisputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

The Republican platform of the same year read in this wise:

The Republican Party favors the enactment of legislation supplementary to the existing antitrust act which will define as criminal offenses those specific acts that uniformly mark attempts to restrain and to monopolize trade, to the end that those who honestly intend to obey the law may have a guide for their action, and that those who aim to violate the law may be the more surely punished.

I quote from the Progressive platform of the same year, as follows:

We therefore demand a strong national regulation of interstate corporations. The corporation is an essential part of modern business. The concentration of modern business in some degree is both inevitable and necessary for national and international business efficiency. * * * We do not fear commercial power, but we insist that it shall be exercised openly, under publicity, supervision, and regulation of the most efficient sort, which shall preserve its good while eradicating and preventing its evils.

The Progressive convention, largely dominated by Perkins of the Harvester Trust, alone failed to denounce trusts as criminal. The omission is significant.

Mr. President, the national platforms of the two great parties have all along contained similar anathemas against trusts and combinations. Both parties have insisted upon the enforcement of the criminal statutes; both parties have demanded the personal responsibility of directors of concerns engaged in monopolizing trade.

I now ask that excerpts from the platforms of the State of Missouri may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MISSOURI PLATFORMS.

DEMOCRATIC, 1892.

We recognize in the trusts and combinations, which are designed to enable capital to secure more than its just share of the joint product of capital and labor, a natural consequence of the prohibitive taxes which prevent the free competition which is the life of honest trade, but we believe their worst evils can be abated by law, and we demand the rigid enforcement of the laws made to prevent and control them, together with such further legislation in restraint of their abuses as experience may show to be necessary.

REPUBLICAN, 1892.

We reaffirm our opposition, declared in the Republican platform of 1888, to all combinations of capital, organized in trusts or otherwise, to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens. We heartily indorse the action already taken upon this subject, and ask for such further legislation as may be required to remedy any defects in existing laws and to render their enforcement more complete and effective.

DEMOCRATIC, 1896.

The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restriction and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

We arraign the Republican Party as guilty of the grossest hypocrisy in the treatment of the trust question, in that being in the ascendency in Congress it has steadfastly refused to pass any of the legislation which has been proposed to curb the power of the trusts; it has failed to withdraw tariff protection from trust-made goods; has constituted the leaders of trusts as the leaders of its party in the Nation, and accepted from them contributions of millions of dollars to its gigantic corruption fund, which fact is itself a menace to the stability of our free institutions. We declare that the existence of trusts is opposed to public welfare. * * * We pledge ourselves, as we have given to the people the strongest possible legislation on this subject in our State, to see that it is enforced, and that it shall be, when in our power, enforced by the Federal Government.

DEMOCRATIC, 1902.

After urging tariff reform as our effective method of dealing with the trusts it adds:

In the event of such legislation failing of its purpose, then we favor the most drastic legislation which can be enacted prohibiting the existence or forming of such trusts or any other such combinations which have even a tendency to destroy honest competition in any line of business or make it possible to arbitrarily regulate wages, prices, rates, or charges of any kind.

DEMOCRATIC, 1906.

We believe Theodore Roosevelt insincere. Pretending to inveigh against the crimes of trusts and corporations, he openly defended Paul Morton, whom, as manager of the Santa Fe Railroad, he compelled to confess enormous rebates to the Colorado Fuel and Iron Co. It was Roosevelt who advanced the pernicious doctrine that you must punish the corporations, not its officials who cause it to commit the crime.

DEMOCRATIC, 1908.

The Democratic Party, both in theory and in practice, ever has been and now is opposed to monopoly and unlawful combinations, and we pledge the party to continue its efforts to protect the people against trust extortion and oppression.

We are not hostile to corporations or to wealth as such, but we insist that corporations as well as individuals, the rich as well as the poor, must obey the laws, and we are determined that the violator of law in the interests of trusts or corporations shall be punished by imprisonment as well as by fine.

REPUBLICAN, 1908.

The attorney general has enforced the laws of the State without fear and without favor. He brought suits against the Standard Oil Trust, the greatest combination of wealth and power the world has ever known; forced its chief officers, for the first time in its history, to respect the orders of the courts and to disclose its plan of organization. This evidence has been used by the National Government and five States as the basis of suits against this trust. He secured a favorable decision upon every one of his charges from the commissioner appointed by the supreme court to try this case, and has forced the discontinuance of the abuses that it had practiced upon the people of Missouri; drove the Republic Oil Co., one of its puppet corporations, from the State, and thus made competition in the oil business possible, with the result that the wholesale price of oil has been reduced over 2 cents a gallon, resulting in a saving of $600,000 each year to the people of Missouri.

He brought suit against the Insurance Trust and forced a rerating of the property of the State on an average reduction of from 10 to 15 per cent in insurance rates, with a consequent saving of $800,000 a year to the people of Missouri. By prompt and vigorous action in the courts he forced the railroads of the State to comply with the 2-cent passenger rate law, resulting in a saving of approximately $1,000,000 each year to the people of Missouri, and has thus secured, by actual experience, the facts necessary for a determination of the reasonableness of this law.

He brought suit against and prevented the further consolidation of the Lumber Trust, and will soon present to the supreme court for final decision an action to oust the Lumber Trust and Harvester Trust from Missouri.

DEMOCRATIC, 1910.

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

MISSOURI LEGISLATURE'S RESOLUTION.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in consonance with these declarations of the Missouri platform action was taken. As early as March 12, 1907, the Legislature of the State of Missouri passed the following resolution:

Whereas our farmers of Missouri invest thousands of dollars annually in the purchase of machinery and farming implements; and

Whereas competition has been greatly reduced in the manufacture of those useful commodities by the combination of the Milwaukee, Deering, Champion, Plano, and the McCormick harvester companies; and

Whereas a trust has been formed to control farming implements necessary to promote agriculture under the name of International Harvester Co. of America; and

Whereas said company is doing business in this State: Therefore be it

Resolved (by the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri), That the Hon. Herbert Hadley, attorney general of Missouri, be kindly requested to investigate the advisability of instituting legal proceedings against said International Harvester Co. of America under and by virtue of the antitrust laws of the State of Missouri.

Resolved, further, That the chief clerk of the House transmit a copy of this resolution to the office of the attorney general.

MISSOURI'S ACTION.

That resolution was probably the initial step taken in my State, if not in the country, to bring the International Harvester Co. to book. For the present I will pass from the topic with the remark that the attorney general of the State did bring a case in the nature of quo warranto. The case was brought directly in the supreme court of the State. That court appointed as commissioner to take the evidence and to make findings of law and of fact Judge Theodore Brace, of nearly 30 years' service upon the supreme bench of the State. That great lawyer and jurist, after an exhaustive hearing, rendered his findings of fact and conclusions of law. The findings of fact disclosed the existence of a combination and trust and a conspiracy in restraint of trade. They were duly submitted to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri over three years ago. A decision was rendered approving the opinion and findings of Judge Brace. That decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri was recently affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision in Missouri was rendered November 27, 1911. The opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri can be found in the One hundred and forty-first Southwestern Reporter, at page 672. The judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States June 8, 1914.

CONVICTIONS IN OTHER STATES.

Mr. President, as early as the year 1907 this concern was charged with crimes under the antitrust laws of the State of Texas, and after pleading guilty was fined $35,000 and ousted from the State. On January 9, 1909, the Supreme Court of Kansas affirmed a verdict of guilty, which was based upon an information filed on the 13th day of October, 1906. The company was at that time fined on 42 counts. The company was also prosecuted in the State of Kentucky in five separate actions. It was found guilty, and the judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky. It was afterwards reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the law was not sufficiently definite.

In all of these contests——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator state, so that it may go into the RECORD, the time of these trials in Kentucky and the date of the reversal by the Supreme Court?

Mr. REED. I am unable to state from the memoranda before me when they were begun, although I thought I had the information—I have it at my desk—but I can give to the Senate, and will do so, a reference which will enable every Senator to find the date.

One of these cases, Commonwealth of Kentucky against The International Harvester Co., was decided March 16, 1912, and is reported in One hundred and forty-fourth Southwestern Reporter, at page 1064.

The next case, bearing the same title, is reported in One hundred and forty-seventh Southwestern Reporter, page 393, and was decided in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, April 10, 1912.

The next case, bearing the same title, was decided April 16, 1912, by the Kentucky Court of Appeals, and is reported in One hundred and forty-sixth Southwestern Reporter, at page 12.

The next case, bearing the same title, is reported in One hundred and forty-seventh Southwestern Reporter, at page 760.

The next case is reported in One hundred and forty-seventh Southwestern Reporter, at page 1199.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Minnesota will allow me to make one more statement, in order to have the matter together, I shall yield.

THE FEDERAL SUIT.

The Government of the United States in 1912 brought a suit against this concern and all of its allies, which is now pending in the United States Circuit Court of Minnesota. The petition in that case was filed April 30, 1912. The evidence has been taken and the cause is still pending, but it has been briefed by the attorneys for the Government. Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. With the leave of the Senator from Missouri, I desire to call his attention to one of the Kentucky cases decided by the Supreme Court here on the 22d of June last. I refer to the case of the International Harvester Co. against the Commonwealth of Kentucky. In that case a fine was imposed by the court in Kentucky, and the only issue the Harvester Co. made in that case was that it had not been properly served with process. Upon that issue the case came to the Supreme Court here, and the Supreme Court held that the company had been properly served. So the fine imposed by the court of Kentucky remained in force against the company.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have said that I believed in the enforcement of the civil and criminal law against these institutions. I am glad to say that that is no new doctrine in the Democratic Party. It has been engraven upon its platforms, and it has been thundered from the lips of its great men. I call attention to just one of the many statements which I might read. It is as follows:

> Other criminal laws are enforced against all offenders who can be found. Why should we draw a distinction between the horse thief who violates the law against horse stealing and the trust magnate who violates the law against the trust? The Senator (Mr. Beveridge) complains because I have said that private monopoly must be eliminated, that the trust must be destroyed root and branch. That is my position, and that position, set forth in the Democratic national platform of 1900, was indorsed by more than 6,000,000 voters.

Who said that? It was not an utterance upon the platform, when men do not always speak their deliberate judgment, when the fervor of the moment may swing them from their balance. It was deliberately written out for publication; and its author was that great man whose image is photographed upon the hearts of the American people, William Jennings Bryan.

> In the beginning the executive officers thought the civil part of the statutes sufficient and attempted to break up the trusts by injunction. That proving unsatisfactory, resort was next had to the criminal provisions of the law with the idea that a fine would be sufficient. The fine has been shown to be ineffective, and the President is turning more and more toward the imprisonment clause. It is useless to attempt to prevent combinations by fines levied against corporations when the fines are small compared with the sums made by combination. Imprisonment, however, is a real punishment, and the trust magnates will become scarce as soon as the penitentiary doors close upon a few of the large offenders.

Again, those are the deliberate words of Mr. Bryan, written and published in a magazine.

CHAMP CLARK'S STATEMENT.

I quote another authority, one whom I delight to honor, one whom the American people honor, because he always speaks from the heart, and the sound of his lips is but the voice of his brave soul:

> If I had my way, I would fill the penitentiaries and jails of the United States so full of trust magnates that their arms and legs would stick out of the windows.

Those are the words of CHAMP CLARK.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S STATEMENT.

I read again:

> The dominating danger in this land is not the existence of great individual combinations—that is dangerous enough, in all conscience—but the combination of the combinations—of the railways, the manufacturing enterprises, the great mining projects, the great enterprises for the development of the natural water powers of the country, threaded together in the personnel of a series of boards of directors into the "community of interest"—more formidable than any conceivable single combination that dare appear in the open.

There is an omission here. I am reading from another part.

> When I am fighting monopolistic control, therefore, I am fighting for the liberty of every man in America and I am fighting for the liberty of American industry.

Brave words, well chosen! They found a response in the hearts of the American people. I read again:

> The great monopoly in this country is the monopoly of big credits. So long as that exists our old variety and freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is privately concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men who, even if their action be honest and intended for the public interest, are necessarily concentrated upon the great undertakings in which their own money is involved and who necessarily, by very reason of their own limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom. This is the greatest question of all, and to this statesmen must address themselves with an earnest determination to serve the long future and the true liberties of men.

The last quotations I have given are from the magic pen, inspired by the wonderful brain of the President of the United States. They are sound principles, splendidly expressed and magnificently put forth, and they are being read as the gospel of truth by thousands of boys and girls throughout the United States of America.

Mr. President, I need not pause, in view of these high authorities, to elaborate the thought that monopoly is indefensible and that monopolists are criminals. Neither need I argue in this presence that he who perpetuates an evil is as guilty as the man who inaugurated it. I scarcely need stop to demonstrate that there is one trust in this country which has never yet been criminally prosecuted that must be criminally prosecuted.

Lest I should be criticized by some Republican newspaper for having abandoned the Democratic Party and so that I may start with my feet upon the ground, I read from the Democratic Handbook of 1912:

> Progressives should support Wilson not only in order to secure his election but in order to enable him after election to carry out those progressive policies which he has so much at heart. His nomination ranks among the most encouraging events of American history. Under the masterful and masterly leadership of Col. Bryan, the ideals of American Democracy triumphed over the reactionaries and their money bags; the will of the people prevailed over the devices of the machine. * * *
> But the struggle of privilege is unending and omnipresent. That struggle is as subtle as it is determined. The struggle will not close when Wilson is elected. We may be sure that every effort he may make as President to carry out progressive policies will meet with stubborn resistance from the possessors and apostles of privilege—

And so forth.

PRESIDENT TAFT ON THE HARVESTER TRUST.

Under the same topic is quoted with approval a statement of President Taft. It was sent out as our proclamation to the American people.

> President Taft added a new chapter to the history of the Harvester Trust here to-night—

This is from a newspaper dated May 4, 1912—

> Speaking to an audience that filled the Lyric Theater to the doors, Mr. Taft declared that Col. Theodore Roosevelt did prevent the prosecution of the Harvester Trust after George W. Perkins, one of its directors, and now a Roosevelt supporter, had asked that the trust be not taken into the courts. * * * He said, in part:
> "The truth about the Harvester Trust is that Mr. Bonaparte thought it ought to be prosecuted. George W. Perkins, who was a director in the Harvester Trust, then a director in the Steel Trust, and also a member of the firm of Morgan & Co., came to Washington and pleaded with Herbert Knox Smith, of the Bureau of Corporations, not to bring the suit, and induced Mr. Smith to make a report to Mr. Roosevelt in which he set forth the fact that the Steel Trust and the Harvester Trust and the other Morgan interests had attempted to carry out Mr. Roosevelt's idea of publicity, and therefore ought not to be subjected to prosecution under the antitrust law, even though they were technically guilty, threatening that if they were prosecuted they would fight the administration, would give them no more access to their books, and would conduct themselves in opposition to the administration."

So arrogant had this trust become that it imagined it was more powerful than the courts of law and that it could withhold its books from the officers of the Government. Nor did it hesitate to send its man Perkins to the President of the United States and demand, upon pain of its anger, that the arm of justice should be paralyzed.

The scoundrel in revolt against the State marching beneath a red flag to the Capitol and demanding that the law shall not be enforced is engaged in a no more impudent practice than was George W. Perkins.

I continue reading from Mr. Taft:

The result was that Mr. Smith made a report on the 21st of September to Mr. Roosevelt, in which he detailed this conversation and recommended that no suit be brought until he had made a full investigation of the Harvester Trust. Before this a report was made by the assistant district attorney of North Dakota and by the district attorney of Minnesota that there were grounds for prosecuting the Harvester Trust and that this trust had violated the antitrust law.

Between September 21 and November 1 the matter was under consideration, and on November 7 the President directed Herbert Knox Smith to notify Mr. Perkins that no prosecution would be begun until after the investigation. That settled the matter, because that is what Mr. Perkins asked for. * * *

Mr. Roosevelt's assumption of virtue is so intense that it is sufficient to purify anyone when he becomes a supporter of Mr. Roosevelt, even though it be a trust and even though it be a director of a trust contributing to his campaign. In other words, when the facts are shown with reference to his failing to prosecute certain trusts and with reference to contributions from a directing officer of such trusts, it hardly lies in his mouth, as a matter of the "square deal," to charge me with being controlled by special interests and privileges.

So said William H. Taft of Theodore Roosevelt. From the lips of President Taft we learn the important fact that this trust regarded itself as so intrenched and powerful that it dared come to the head of the greatest Nation on earth, and, bearding him in his office at the Capital, demand a surrender at the price of its displeasure.

Mr. President, moral questions are the same to-day, yesterday, and forever.

With this introduction regarding the Harvester Trust I want to put into the RECORD some salient facts regarding that institution, developed in the pending suit of the Government against the Harvester Trust. If, sir, one-tenth of that which the Government alleges in its petition as true be true, then it is the duty of the Attorney General to proceed against every officer of that company as he now assures us he intends to proceed against the New Haven Railroad and its officers, civilly and criminally.

The Harvester Trust was hatched in the offices of Pierpont Morgan. Prior to 1902 there were in the United States a total of 12 manufacturers of harvesting machinery. Seven of these were quite small. Five of them were very large and powerful. I name them in the order of their importance:

The McCormick, which had been in business since 1849.

The Osborne, in business since 1860.

The Champion, in business since 1868.

The Deering, in business since 1875.

The Plano and the Milwaukee, in business for many years.

Mr. Glessner, the president of the Champion, testified in the Government's suit that these names have been known as trade names for the period I have indicated.

The five companies to which I have just referred controlled, in 1902, from 90 per cent of the business in agricultural implements in certain sections of the country to 100 per cent of the business in certain other large sections of the country. These five companies each controlled some standard make of harvesting machinery, without which no agent could hope to succeed or to live as a dealer in agricultural implements.

It is admitted in the answer filed in the Government suit that from 80 to 85 per cent of the business in the United States in agricultural implements was controlled by these five institutions. It is established indubitably by proof that their control was much larger than is admitted.

Here, then, we had this condition: Five great companies and seven smaller companies supplying all of the agricultural and harvesting machines for all of the millions of farmers of the United States. Moreover, sir, every one of these companies was profitable and making money. There was the keenest competition. They had their rival agencies in almost every hamlet and village of the United States. Their agents even went along the highways in the country for the purpose of soliciting the custom of farmers. Every farmer in the United States had at least five different places where he could go to buy his harvesting machinery. If he was dissatisfied with the offer of one he could go to the others. Moreover, prices were constantly falling. Competition was so keen that accommodation was easy. Yet, with all the keen competition, every one of these concerns was making money. They did not have the poor excuse that they were forced to become a trust in order to escape bankruptcy.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. One moment, and then I will yield. When they organized the trust they appointed a committee to appraise its assets. That committee made its solemn report, from which I read a clause:

Your committee are of the opinion that the five properties mentioned in Mr. Lane's offer—

That is, the five great properties I have mentioned—are the most important in their line of business in the United States and that each of them has for several years enjoyed a prosperous, profitable, and growing business.

In order to make a little more definite what I have had to say with reference to the extent of the business of these companies, I ask leave to print a table showing the output of these companies and the output of all outside companies in the year 1902.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

	Binders.	Mowers.	Corn binders.	Rakes.	Reapers.
McCormick, IV, 215	67,592	129,066	16,264	74,446	16,771

[1] Not disclosed, but about same as Plano.

On the other hand, the sales of the independent companies were the following for 1902:

	Binders.	Mowers.	Corn binders.	Rakes.	Reapers.
Adriance-Platt Co., III, 360	732	6,276	43	11	340
Johnston Harvester Co., III, 378	780	2,416	711	2,056	270
Walter A. Wood Co., III, 305	919	4,916	106	7,078	108
Total	2,431	13,608	860	9,145	718

Minnie Harvester Co., XIII, 49 (acquired by International Harvester Co. in 1903), 2,500 binders.

Acme Harvesting Machine Co. figures were unobtainable for 1902–1904, it having been in the hands of a creditors' committee.

Mr. REED. I call attention to just two items, namely, that these five companies manufactured that year 177,892 binders, while all of the other companies combined manufactured only 2,431. I omit from the latter figure the Minnie Harvester Co., because it was acquired by the trust within a few months thereafter. Including the Osborne plant, there were manufactured by the companies brought into this consolidation 195,392 binders in the year 1902, and all of the outside production aggregated only 2,431.

The control of these five companies in a great many places was substantially complete. In the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Oklahoma, Indian Territory, Texas, western Kentucky, Tennessee, and part of Illinois these five concerns, then independent, controlled from 95 to 100 per cent of all of the business in harvesting machinery. In the States of Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota, and Wisconsin they controlled from 95 to 100 per cent.

I ask leave to print in connection with these statements excerpts from the testimony taken in this case; and I make the same request with reference to that which immediately follows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

M. H. Gibbs, in 1902 and for several years prior thereto general agent for D. M. Osborn & Co., having charge of sales in Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Oklahoma, Indian Territory, Texas, the western part of Kentucky, and Tennessee and part of Illinois, testified that the six companies were doing in 1902 in that territory 95 per cent, if not more, of the business in binders, 95 per cent in mowers, and all, or 100 per cent, in corn binders (III, 110, fols. 3–4).

R. E. Mason from 1899 to 1903 general agent of the Plano Co. at Grand Island, Nebr., having charge of the western half of Nebraska, stated that practically all of the business (100 per cent) in that territory was done by the five companies which went into the International (III, 178, fol. 4).

H. E Porter, for six years general agent of D. M. Osborne & Co. at Chicago, testified that in 1902 the six companies did from 90 to 95 per cent of the business in binders in Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Indiana (III, 92, fol. 4), and the same per cent in mowers (III, 94, fol. 4).

M. H. Lamb, in 1902 general agent of the McCormick Co. at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., having charge of southwestern Minnesota, part of Iowa, and part of South Dakota, testified that the five companies in that territory did "practically all, at least 90 per cent," of the business in binders, 75 to 80 per cent in mowers, and 95 per cent in corn binders (II, 315).

Mr. REED. In South Dakota, one witness stated, they controlled practically all—at least 95 per cent.

The extent of the business in the United States exceeded annually $100,000,000.

That control, I remark now, has been maintained up to this time in substantially the same way it was before. It is as complete now as it ever was, and statements that have been made by Mr. Jones to the contrary are aside from the facts and in the teeth of sworn testimony. The Government shows in its brief, at page 68, and cites the record to sustain it, that the International Harvester Co. in 1912 manufactured and sold in the United States 111,447 binders, while all of the outside companies manufactured and sold only 19,535 machines, and part of those were made in a penitentiary.

Therefore the claim that any man connected with this institution does not know he is running a monopoly is to claim that a man can not recognize the plainest facts ever laid down to demonstration.

In 1902 Mr. Morgan succeeded in organizing the great Steel Trust. He had gathered together under one control nearly all of the good iron ores of North America, splendid deposits the Almighty had placed here for the people of to-day and for the shadowy hosts that are yet to come. Morgan had gathered in the great rivals engaged in manufacturing steel. He had paid to them the plunderer's profit. He capitalized the power of monopoly to rob the American people. He issued bonds against it. These bonds are now used to purchase respectability for a certain gentleman upon the lintels of whose doors there are yet to be detected the red drops of Homestead.

Having succeeded in completely dominating the great field of the manufacture and production of steel, having brought within his control that primal necessity without which civilization could not exist, and but for which the wheels of progress would be rolled back a thousand years, he looked about for new fields to conquer. He found that the fields were ripe and the proprietors were willing. I should say that he found that those who made the machines to reap the fields were ripe, and mighty willing.

THE ORGANIZATION.

The five great companies were consolidated into a trust. At the time of the organization they contemplated crushing or acquiring all companies not taken into the combination. In order that I may now dispose of this branch of the subject, I call attention to these outside companies and to what the trust did to them.

In 1903 it acquired the Osborne Co., which was the largest outside competitor. The Osborne was capitalized at $1,000,000. The same year it acquired the Aultman-Miller Co. for $640,000; also, it acquired the Minnie Harvester Co. The next year it gathered in the Keystone Co. About the same time it took in the Weber Wagon Co. In 1906 it acquired Kemp & Co., manufacturers of manure spreaders, at Newark Valley, N. Y., and Waterloo, Iowa, and they closed the Waterloo plant. In 1906 it absorbed the Bettendorf Axle Co., makers of wagons. It owns all of the stock of the Wisconsin Steel Co., amounting to $1,000,000. It has acquired the Wisconsin Lumber Co., capitalized at $250,000. It owns the Illinois Northern Railroad and the Chicago, West Pullman & Southern Railroad, two little railroads used in connection with their plants, capitalized at $900,000. It has acquired the International Flax Co., capitalized at $250,000.

Thus, instead of shrinking their control, instead of going out of the monopoly business in the last five years, they have constantly extended their plants in numbers, in activity, and the scope of that which they manufacture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator leaves that branch of the question I want to ask him to permit me to interject the statement that in acquiring those competitors they resorted to some of the most despicable and disgraceful proceedings to do so. Possibly the Senator from Missouri intends to set forth that fact. I call to mind at the present time that it is in official evidence that in the case of the Osborne Harvester Co., which was the company in the United States doing the largest foreign business, the acquisition was secured not by the voluntary sale of the Osborne Co., but by the act of the International Harvester Co., after negotiations for a voluntary purchase had failed, in destroying the credit of the Osborne Co., so that its large loans were called by banks, and in order to save itself from bankruptcy it was compelled to sell out to the International Harvester Co. Nor did that tell all the story; because, as I recall, for two years after the Osborne Co. had been compelled to sell out to the Harvester Trust, the Harvester Trust secretly ran and operated the Osborne Co. as a pretended independent, for the purpose of deceiving the trade and defrauding the customers who thought they were dealing with an independent company. The same practice that was indulged in in that case was indulged in also in others, when independent companies were acquired and competition crushed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am coming to a great deal of that matter later on, but I thank the Senator for his contribution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator state, if he knows, what the entire capital stock of the International Harvester Co. is now?

Mr. REED. I am coming to that, but I will state it now. The capital stock of the International Harvester Co. when it was organized was $120,000,000. It was afterwards increased to $140,000,000. Then the European and Canadian business was taken out of the company, and a new company organized with $60,000,000 capital, and the International's capital was reduced to $80,000,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator answer one other question—whether farming implements and machinery have increased or decreased in price since the organization of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I can answer the question. Farming implements remained about the same until they got rid of nearly all outside competitors, and then farming implements went up. But, Mr. President, I pause at this time to remark—because it is especially pertinent with reference to an issue raised by Mr. Jones—that the fact that prices may not have been raised is no answer to the objections to this trust, because prior to the organization of this trust the price of farming machinery had been going steadily down, while the quality of the machinery had been going steadily up. When the trust was organized the improvement in quality, in my opinion—and I state it merely as a matter of opinion—largely ceased, while the price no longer went down as had been the case before the organization.

That, of course, is the justification which John D. Rockefeller puts forth. He continually asserts he did not increase the price of oil, but who shall say what oil would be selling for if there had been an open field and no man to stand and monopolize that field?

However, that is leading me away from my theme.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield, and to whom?

Mr. REED. I will yield if the Senators really desire to ask questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to say, in answer to the Senator from Utah, that the price of harvesting machinery has increased from 15 to 25 per cent in the past three or four years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is my own information about it. The statement was made upon the floor of the Senate several years ago, probably four years ago, and I never have heard it denied, that in the State of North Dakota—perhaps the Senator from North Dakota can tell us about that—the price of binders had risen since 1902 up to the time this statement was made from $100 to $150, which would be considerably more than an increase of 25 or 30 per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to inquire if the Senator later on in his address expects to put into the RECORD the value or the capitalization of these concerns that were merged in the trust.

Mr. REED. I expect to do so. If I omit it, I shall be glad to have the Senator call my attention to it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am anxious that that shall be done.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to add to the statement of the Senator from Utah that I know of my own knowledge that binders were sold for as low as $90 in the State of North Dakota and we are paying for those binders to-day $155 cash.

If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I was going to call his attention a moment ago to the fact that the report made by the Department of Commerce and Labor during the year 1913 shows that it cost the independent companies 20½ per cent more to manufacture harvesting machinery than it cost the International Harvester Trust, and in the face of that I will say that the independent companies have been selling harvester machinery at a lower price than the International Harvester Trust.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Missouri was asked by the Senator from Utah regarding the capitalization, and the Senator stated it had been increased to $140,000,000. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that an increase of $20,000,000 was the declaration of a stock dividend in 1910.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. I will, perhaps, touch on some of those things if I do not get too weary.

I just now desire to inquire what was the purpose of organizing this combination? I have already shown by the report of the committee on organization that it had been found that every one of the five companies was in a prosperous condition. Therefore they were not being forced by bankruptcy or misfortune into a position where they had to combine in order to save themselves.

I now call attention to the charge in the Government's petition. The petition charges that—

> McCormick, Deering, Glessner, William J. Jones, George W. Perkins, and others, nearly all of whom were owners or officers of the five companies, "believing combination could yield large profits, determined to bring it about, destroying existing competition among the five concerns, and through combinations and agreements in restraint of trade to exclude all others and secure control of and monopolize interstate trade and commerce in harvesting machinery and twine. They further determined that when they had accomplished the purposes just mentioned they should extend into other classes of agricultural machinery and finally monopolize interstate trade and commerce in agricultural machinery of all kinds, their purpose being to use the power obtained by a monopoly of trade in harvesting machinery in such a way as to acquire a similar monopoly in every class of agriculture."

So charged the Government of the United States in 1912. So charges the Government of the United States to-day in its petition. The charge is indubitably true. I read from one of the letters that were sent out to the agents of these companies shortly after the consolidation:

> We believe that in the near future this great company will do practically all the harvesting business of the world. * * * It is according to and in harmony with the divine plan.

"It is according to and in harmony with the divine plan." Who was it last before this gentleman said that God had put the control of great properties in the hands of a selected few, he being, of course, one of the elect? The man is dead now, and I will not name him.

Mr. President, the allegation of purpose contained in this petition is borne out by every subsequent act of the incorporators. Why is it necessary to produce evidence that a combination of this kind was organized for the purpose of plunder? Why is it necessary to argue that? Will anyone tell me why a lot of prosperous men running their independent businesses will yield their sovereignty over them, their pride in the success of their business ventures, their love of independence, and concentrate them under a management and control where they are at best but partners, if not figureheads, unless the purpose is to make money? Will any man tell me why a monopoly was ever organized in this world except for the purpose of extorting money? There never was a monopolist on this earth who in the center of his heart was not a thief, and there never will be.

Harsh language you say. Let us analyze it. What is a thief? He is a man who by stealth, by artifice, by cunning, takes his neighbor's goods against his neighbor's will. The essential of the wrong is that the neighbor did not consent; he was compelled to yield by the force of cunning. What is a monopolist? The man who organizes a monopoly gathers all of a certain product into his hands with no other object than this, that he may apply the force of human necessity to compel human beings to surrender their property to his inhuman greed.

But I return to discuss the concrete proposition. I desire at this point to quote without reading certain excerpts from the Bureau of Corporations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Bureau of Corporations, Department of Commerce and Labor (Mar. 3, 1913), demonstrates from the testimony of the harvester people themselves that prior to the consolidation the various harvester companies of the United States were engaged in an active and fierce competition (p. 59). It is a fact that two of the objects in creating the trust was—
> 1. To eliminate competition.
> 2. To issue inflated securities (p. 60–a).
> The bureau adds:
> "There is no doubt that the true motive for the formation of the International Harvester Co. was to eliminate competition and secure a dominant position in the trade. This was also the salient fact of the transaction. The purposes of reducing costs and expenses by organizing a single great concern from several large ones was a secondary motive" (p. 70).

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I come to a demonstration of the proposition that every one of the organizers of this institution knew he was engaged in a criminal venture, that the answer now on file in the United States court in Minnesota is a false answer deliberately made, and that those who were parties to the making of that answer sought to impose an untruth in the temple of justice. They pleaded—and I quote:

> That in accordance with separately conducted negotiations with the representatives of the Deering, McCormick, Plano, and Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Companies, said companies, pursuant to oral agreements theretofore independently and separately reached by their representatives and defendant Perkins, executed separate contracts on July 28, 1902, each of which was substantially similar to Exhibit 1 attached to the petition.

The Government had charged that there was concert of action, a common purpose, in organizing this trust, and that charge was met by the solemn plea that there was not such concert, but that they had each made a separate and independent deal; that they did not come together in combination, but were actually purchased outright in good faith by somebody who afterwards sold them to a company. That plea was also repeated in substance by Mr. George W. Perkins. Mr. Perkins in his answer used this language, that the properties were acquired "through separate negotiations with the officers and owners of the McCormick, Deering, Plano, and Champion companies"; that they "contracted for the purchase by the corporation he was about to form of the plants, properties, and business of those four companies, respectively," the point of it all being that these gentlemen thought they could convince a court that they had by separate arrangement each sold his property to some individual. The individual, having acquired all the property, could as the sole proprietor sell it to a company. So the illustrious conspirators plead that there was no concert of action, and that there was, in fact, an actual good-faith purchase by independent contracts. These were the answers of all the defendants, and any defendant, particularly Jones, the lawyer defendant, surely knew the answer was based on a sham and was therefore a fraudulent answer.

Mr. President, the pretense they undertook to put off upon the courts was an ancient one with them. It was indulged in from the very first. It was a fiction they had set up. I propose to trace that fiction not so much because it is so unique as because it colors and taints and gives a cast to all the conduct of these gentlemen.

By the way, that same pretense was set up in the State of Missouri in the suit there and relied upon. In the Missouri case, if I correctly understand the record, the State was not able to disprove the claim, but there was some testimony given in that case in Missouri which the Government in its brief now charges was false testimony. But of that a little later.

When the Government came to try this last case they put these gentlemen on the witness stand. It also found some agents of the trust who seemed to be willing to tell the truth. It was developed that the proprietors of these companies, who now allege they made independent contracts, went to New York and stopped at separate hotels; that they were in touch with Francis Lynn Stetson and William Nelson Cromwell and George W. Perkins; that Stetson assured McCormick that Morgan would be willing to stand back of the combination of the harvesting-machine companies. But Stetson also told them that if they all transferred their property to one corporation they would violate the trust laws. The danger of the law was distinctly discussed. They speculated as to how they could avoid the law; how they could perpetrate the crime in all its essence and yet so escape the form that they would go unwhipped of justice. These good citizens sat down with the statutes of the United States before them not to ask the question, "How shall we act that we may accord with the law?" but "How can we defeat the law and warp it to our evil purposes? How may we perpetrate a fraud upon the law?" They were advised they could not combine by direction, and so they sought by indirection to find direction out. It was Mr. Cromwell, now well known to fame, who suggested that while the combination could not be made directly there was "nothing that could prevent people from selling their business to whomsoever they wanted or anybody else from buying."

So here was the suggestion of a means by which they, as they fondly hoped, could beat the law. Thereupon a man named Lane was secured. Mr. Lane has been mixed up with a great many corporate transactions. Mr. Lane prepared five identical contracts, to be signed by each one of these five companies. Each of these contracts recited that the seller should take his pay in the stock of a company to be capitalized at $120,000,000 and should transfer all the property of the particular concern to Lane.

A lot of ordinary thick-headed criminals who never undertook to rise above the dignity of robbing hencoops would have had sense enough to know that such a subterfuge as that would never stand in law or morals if the facts were once dragged forth.

The contracts were executed at substantially the same time by all five of these concerns. Thus Lane became the nominal dummy holder of all of the property of the constituent companies.

I pause to call attention to the fact that each of these contracts carefully avoided any reference to the fact that other contracts were being made; but the stupid gentlemen forgot that the clause which linked them all to one corporation—for all were to take their pay in the stock of the same corporation—was as deadly as though they had written their purpose upon the face of the instrument.

The Government declares that for 10 years this fiction has been put upon the country, and the Government demonstrates from the records that its position is correct.

Now, all this property having been transferred to dummy Lane, they, on the 12th day of August, 1902, organized a corporation with six dummy directors. I am almost quoting now the language of the Government brief.

Dummy Lane thereupon transmitted a proposition by one of the dummy directors to the other dummy directors to sell to this company for $120,000,000 of its stock all the property of these five great concerns.

Thereupon the six dummy directors appointed a committee of three dummy directors to consider Lane's proposition. Meanwhile, waiting in different hotels around town, were the proprietors of these concerns, which were all being sold at the same time. Of course all of them were innocent of any knowledge of what was transpiring.

I resume the narrative. The three dummies solemnly considered dummy Lane's dummy proposition and reported back to their three associate dummies. The minutes of that interesting meeting recite that the president, who was one of the six dummies, announced that the committee were prepared to report, and "the committee also stated they had invited E. H. Gary, Esq., chairman of the executive committee of the United States Steel Corporation, to be present because of his familiarity with the properties covered by Mr. Lane's proposition."

Mr. Gary was there. Why should he not be there? It was a Morgan proposition; only it is remarkable that Morgan sent Gary instead of sending another dummy, because everybody will admit that Gary is no dummy. The dummies then resolved solemnly to accept Mr. Lane's proposition. The dummy officers were authorized to issue to dummy Lane 1,200,000 shares of stock in this dummy company, of the par value of $120,000,000.

At the next meeting, which was immediately, a resolution was passed by the dummies declaring that the working capital was $132,000,000, and an entry was ordered to be made to show a surplus of $72,000,000, the balance being covered by the stock of $60,000,000, which was all that was issued up to that date.

The board then went to dinner. These six dummies had appetites and appear to have been possessed of "bodies and parts and passions." They went to dinner as other mortals might go.

After dinner they reconvened and increased the number of directors from 6 to 18. Thereupon Cyrus H. McCormick, Charles Deering, Norman B. Ream, Charles Steele, Harold F. McCormick, William H. Jones, John J. Glessner, George W. Perkins, E. H. Gary, Cyrus Beltley, Paul D. Cravath, Richard F. Howe, Stanley McCormick, James Deering, and William Deering were elected directors. They found themselves suddenly in possession of this corporation. The dummies had folded their tents like the Arabs and silently stolen into the night. Thus these men who had been told they could not combine their properties in one concern without violating the criminal laws of the country now found themselves purged and washed of their sins, sitting serenely behind mahogany desks, in possession of just such a combination. They fondly imagined they could impose the fraud upon the people of the United States and upon the courts of justice. For 10 years that fiction has been kept up. The present directors of this company authorized a false answer, alleging that they had made independent sales to be filed in the courts at St. Paul, and upon that false and fraudulent answer they are standing to-day.

Mr. President, who were these dummies? I want to put the names in the RECORD. There was dummy Lane, president of the Standard Trust Co. He possessed one of those accommodating memories which enabled him on the witness stand in the Government's case to forget nearly everything that had transpired. Reading through his testimony I am led to believe that he only remembers his name from force of habit, and not from tenacity of thought.

Dummy Hyatt was vice president of the New York Security & Trust Co., who acted at the request of Perkins. (111–A.)

Dummy Miller was a stockbroker and could not even remember how he came to be a dummy. (111–B.)

Dummy Cravath was the South American agent of the Trinidad Asphalt Co., doing business principally in Venezuela. (112–A.)

Dummy Cotton was a law clerk. (112–B.)

None of these men was interested in the agricultural implement business. Some of them probably would have scared at the sight of a Jersey cow and would not have been able to distinguish the difference between a self-binder and a hayrake. A touch of humor, however, is found in the fact that after all their attempts at concealment and the claim that Lane was an independent purchaser, it transpires that all of the details were prepared in the office of a lawyer who was one of the counsel of Morgan & Co.

Mr. President, it is not difficult to tell how they got those dummies; it is not difficult to tell how they get directors. Morgan was a great attraction in his day and generation. There were men who would rather be a director in the house of Morgan than to dwell in the tents of the righteous. In every age of the world's history there have been men willing to serve. If I might be pardoned a paraphrase of Macaulay's lines, I would repeat:

> Wher'er you shed the honey, the buzzing fly will crowd,
> Wher'er you fling the carrion, the raven's croak is loud,
> Wher'er down Tiber garbage floats, the greedy pike you see,
> And whereso'er a Morgan's found, a Perkins sure will be.

[Laughter.]

And Perkins was an expert in the selection of dummies. I suppose we might account for these lesser lights by paraphrasing the ancient doggerel.

> So big fleas have little fleas, all smaller still to bite 'em;
> And so the game goes merrily, in fact, ad infinitum.

Morgan! Perkins! McCormick! Jones! I thus run down the scale.

Mr. President, what did these gentlemen proceed to do? Having created this monstrous thing, the first proposition was to perpetuate it. Accordingly they organized a voting trust; indeed, that was provided for in the original agreement. Every share of stock was put into the hands of the three voting trustees and by them in turn deposited with Pierpont Morgan. Instead of issuing shares of stock to the proprietors of the constituent concerns, so that the stock might by possibility have got upon the market, being afraid to trust each other, and knowing well how to estimate each other, they made sure of a common ownership and common management and a monopolistic control by requiring them actually to deposit, physically, every share of their stock with Pierpont Morgan. Then they issued certificates, not of stock, but certificates that Morgan held stock for them. They were even afraid to trust each other with the certificates showing that they were entitled to shares of stock; accordingly they required the hypothecation with Morgan of the greater portion of those certificates.

Mr. President, at the time I was interrupted I was talking about the voting trust. This trust was made up of George W. Perkins, Cyrus McCormick, and Mr. Deering, the three gentlemen most active in forming that criminal trust, the three men most active in seeking deliberately to debauch the law by perpetrating a fraud upon the law. It was agreed that for 10 years these men, exercising through the power of voting trustees, should completely control the Harvester Trust. From that day to this blessed hour every director in the corporation has been selected by these three men. If you can imagine three gentlemen sitting down and organizing a trust in defiance of the law, paying Mr. Morgan three million four hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars as a fee for working out the consolidation and tying it all together for 10 long years—if you can imagine gentlemen inspired by such motives and such purposes electing directors for the purpose of having those directors reform the institution they had created in fraud, brought forth in iniquity, and cradled in crime, then you can imagine something beyond my inventive genius. The stream——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. In one moment. The stream does not rise higher than the fountain source; the creature is not often better than the master; the devil has not yet been known to seek out saints that saints may reform perdition. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, are any of the directors operating under a voting trust such as this, anything except mere dummies?

Mr. REED. I can not see how they could be. This voting trust expired in 1912, and my remarks should be confined to those directors holding that position prior to that time. But since 1912, when the voting trust expired by limitation, it appears that the old directors are still largely in office, and so much did the McCormicks love the trust idea that they got up a voting trust of their own after the original voting trust had expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. While the voting trust expired in 1912, it should be borne in mind that the voting trust elected the directors for a term of years, and that in the case of Mr. Jones particularly that term has not yet expired. My recollection is that the election is for five years.

Mr. REED. When you talk about a director elected under those circumstances reforming and breaking down the policies of the man who elected him, you arouse laughter. Absurdity knows no extreme beyond the acceptance of such a statement.

Mr. President, when they created this voting trust, how much water there was in the stock I can not tell. I heard it testified the other day that the assets far exceeded the amount of the capital stock, but I find on examination that the appraisal of these properties was turned over to gentlemen the majority of whom, if my recollection serves me right, were nominated by the Morgan interests. However that may be, they took over the properties at what was called their book value, and every man who knows anything about the term "book value" when it is applied to old concerns understands that it is generally vastly in excess of real value. But, sir, after they had put these properties in at their book value they still increased that amount by some $16,946,542; not so great an increase as is frequently found, but upon the very face of their own books there was that much water put into the company. I have not the slightest doubt, estimating the properties according to the real value, there was at least 50 per cent of water. I ask to have printed a tabulation of these figures which I have taken from the report of the Bureau of Corporations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection permission is granted.

The tabulation referred to is as follows:

WATERED STOCK OF THE INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.

At the time of the organization of the trust, the physical value of the properties transferred, as appeared on the books of the various companies, was as follows (Bureau of Corporations report, p. 125):

McCormick	$19,761,821.80
Deering	13,758,401.87
Plano	2,708,982.48
Champion	3,824,251.45
Milwaukee	3,000,000.00
Total actual value as appeared on the books of the companies	43,053,457.60

Value as raised by the International Harvester Co. upon its organization:

McCormick	$29,461,481.03
Deering	28,081,514.69
Plano	2,708,982.48
Champion	3,824,251.45
Milwaukee	3,000,000.00
Total value as raised by International Harvester Co	67,076,229.65

For this amount the company paid $60,000,000 in stock.

Company was organized with capital stock of $120,000,000; cash stock subscription was $60,000,000; actual value of property, $43,053,457.60; total of actual value, $103,053,457.60; leaving the difference between the $120,000,000 and the $103,053,457.60, or $16,946,542.40 watered stock.

This was not in payment of good will, as appears in the following statement (Bureau of Corporations report, p. 100):

In view of the evidence that the higher appraisals, particularly of natural resources, were frequently excessive, the bureau is satisfied that the appraisal of $4,963,909 for this McCormick land was altogether too high. One of the officials of the International Harvester Co., when questioned on this point, said:

"The higher valuation was adopted in the books for two reasons: First, because it was considered a reasonable valuation at that time; and, second, because there being no good will in the capitalization of the International Harvester Co. it was considered only fair and proper that the higher valuation of the appraisal should be used."

This statement clearly indicates that the valuation placed upon this real estate was excessive in that one reason why the International Harvester Co. felt justified in adopting it was that the company did not take account of good will in computing its assets.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, being organized in this wise, the proprietors of the concern set about to carry out its evil designs. Its first great acquisition was the last large single manufacturer of agricultural implements outside of the combination. I omitted to say, but now say, that they took in through Morgan & Co., the Milwaukee Harvester Co. at the time of organization; but immediately after the organization they took in the Osborne Co., and paid for it $3,365,000.

Now I challenge the attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who has given so much study to the question of fair trade, to the prevention of those evils which we are asked to sit here in this sweltering weather to prevent, namely, the secret devices and the fraudulent practices by which great concerns crush their small rivals—I challenge all of you who believe in that kind of legislation, and who are willing to sit here and abide the summer's heat and the fatigues of the season and jeopardize your health, to hearken while I read you a few chapters out of the book, not of unfair competition, but of destructive and often criminal competition.

THEIR CRIMINAL COURSE.

They acquired early in 1903 the great Osborne Co., but they kept secret the fact that they had acquired it. Why? Because if they could keep that fact from the public they could use this supposedly independent concern in a way to deceive the public. They could use it to cut prices. They could use it to invade the territory of rivals. They could divide the trade of those who were unwilling to purchase from a trust, obtaining part of it for themselves through the instrumentality of this supposedly independent concern. So they kept the purchase secret, and they advertised all over the country the Osborne products as goods made by a concern independent of the trust and engaged in fighting the trust. Aye, they required or permitted—I know not which—their agent to go into the State of Missouri and apply for permission to do business there, and to make this affidavit:

That the company is not a party to any agreement or combination to fix prices or output; that it has not entered into any arrangement with any other corporation or persons, or placed the management and control in the hands of trustees for such purposes, or made any arrangement that in any way tends to interfere with full and free competition in the manufacture or sale of its products.

And yet when these gentlemen sent this agent to the State of Missouri to sign this false affidavit they knew that he would be required to swear falsely or that they could not do business within that State. This is the concern that through one of its agents announced that it was "organized according to the divine plan."

Mr. President, some two years later they had to or did publicly announce their ownership of this company, and then for the first time they elected new officers. Up to that time they kept the names of the officers of the old company at the head of the institution.

I pass from this piece of attempted fraud upon the public, from this specimen of unfair competition, which I commend to those who seek to set up new tribunals that we may prevent unfair competition as one device that ought to be included. I commend to the attention of those who seek to bring to the bar of law all who are guilty of unfair practices this particular device of this particular company.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I inquire during what years that device was resorted to?

Mr. REED. In 1903, 1904, and part of 1905.

The next step in the onward march of this beneficent institution was the acquisition of the Minnie Harvester Co. They acquired that in 1903. They operated it for two seasons as an independent plant, advertised it as an independent plant, and then, having squeezed all the juice out of that lemon, having removed it from the field of competition by absorbing it, they closed down the works and dismantled them—another evidence of the beneficence of monopoly.

Here had been a hive of human industry; here the whirring wheels and the blazing furnaces had made a scene of industrial activity and prosperity; here was a place from which wages flowed; here was a means of enriching a local community. Here was an industry put out of commission, the furnaces drawn, the smoke of the chimney died out, and the thousands of poor people dependent upon it for a livelihood turned out of employment and compelled to seek labor elsewhere; and here was another fraud being perpetrated upon our farmers.

Why, I can imagine one of these rugged old fellows, who hates a trust with that instinctive hatred which springs from the heart and soul of every honest man, driving to town and saying: "I will not patronize a trust," falling into the hands of an agent of the trust, and being told, "Why, neither the Minnie machine nor the Osborne machine is in a trust; we are fighting the trust." And so, believing that he was doing a little service to his country and his country's God by patronizing a concern that was fighting the trust, the old fellow goes down in his pocket and pays for a machine. The agent chuckles and laughs at the ignorance of the farmer, and remarking "How easy it is to do up those old fellows," remits the money to Perkins. I can see the smile that passes over that pious countenance, almost as beatific as it is when he sits in the presence of the great Roosevelt, basking in the light reflected from his noble brow—I can see the smile of pleasure upon the Perkins countenance as he counts the sheckels that came from the farmer who thought he was not buying from a trust.

The Aultman-Miller Co.—I do not know who battered the Aultman-Miller Co. down. I do know that very naturally it would be crushed by such a rival. Later on I shall give some evidence of the fact that all independent companies suffered from the unfair and unjust conduct of this company; but the Aultman-Miller Co. was gobbled up by the Harvester Trust. The interest of the Harvester Co. in this concern was kept secret for two long years. It was advertised as an independent concern. It owned the patents and the good will of the old Buckeye machine.

Why, sir, that was one of the first machines ever made in this country. When I was a boy it was singing its merry song in the meadows of my State. It was regarded as one of the few machines that could be relied upon to cut through everything from underbrush to wire grass. They put the old Buckeye out of business. It is no longer manufactured. If the plant had been sold to some independent company, the Buckeye would still be manufactured. But why should this concern, which had a monopoly, continue to manufacture the old Buckeye mowing machine? Accordingly it ceased to be.

Then they acquired in 1904 the Keystone Co. That was a company engaged in the manufacture of corn shellers, hay tools, and tillage implements.

What else did the trust do? It discharged numerous agents. Its method of economy was to cut off men's bread and butter to increase the profits of its proprietors.

Herein lies a good illustration. Put 20 concerns in the market doing business. Each will have a great number of agents soliciting business. Accordingly a part of the profits of the concerns is distributed to the agents. Consolidate them all now as a trust, make the monopoly complete, and it can and will discharge substantially every agent. What happens then? Instead of the profits being divided between the proprietor and the large number of agents, the proprietor gets all. The agents must go elsewhere and find work. So the trust discharged a vast number of agents employed before the consolidation.

Mr. President, the trust made low prices in order to shut out competitors, to destroy its weaker rivals. I read from the Government's brief, which contains a copy of the report of the meeting of the sales committee. This committee, meeting in the city of Chicago, reported as follows:

> It considers it of the utmost importance, for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the sale of grain harvesters, that the retail price be kept low.

That does not make the purpose very plain. Follow me on:

> Second. It believes a reasonably low price on twine this season will discourage smaller manufacturers from competing for the business for 1903 and for the future.
> Third. It believes the present price of fiber would enable a manufacturer to produce twine at a cost of not to exceed 9 cents per pound, and that any price over 10 cents would make the business more attractive to the smaller manufacturer than is desirable.

And so, not because they loved the people, but because they wanted to crush the smaller manufacturer, they continued low prices in the particular instances to which I have called attention.

I cite the item, not because of its inherent importance, but because it points a policy and manifests a purpose.

They undertook—and again I challenge the attention of the students of unfair competition—to deprive their rivals in the twine business and in the smaller agricultural-implement business of their good agents. I read briefly from the Government's argument:

> In the summer of 1903 the only companies competing with the International in selling harvesting machines in the great grain sections of the Central West were the Acme Co., of Peoria, Ill., which was in the hands of a creditors' committee, the Aultman Miller Co., of Dayton, Ohio, bought by the International Harvester Co., July, 1903, and the Minnie Harvester Co., of Minneapolis. The latter company started in business in the early part of 1902. It put on the market in that year 2,500 machines, and in 1903, 3,000 machines. The following sales report, dated April 30, 1903, signed by each of the sales committee, and approved by the executive committee of the International, discloses the character of the competition the Minnie Co. encountered:
> The Grass Twine Co. has a few good agents in points in Minnesota, the Dakotas, Iowa, Kansas, and Oklahoma. It is desired to keep the trade of these agents as small as possible and get them as agents for this company next year, and it is believed this can be accomplished if the divisions are especially active at these places. It is therefore decided that each division shall be permitted to locate a canvasser at each of these places where the volume of trade will justify it and where the division is well enough organized at the town to make the work effective, these men not to count on the regular allotment.

Translating that, it means that they had organized a "flying squadron" of experts, who were to invade the territories where the weaker companies had good agents. They were to work so assiduously as to ruin the business of those agents and take away their trade, and then, the agents having been discouraged in this way, this company intended to hire them the next year.

I call the attention of the author of the bill on unfair competition to that practice and to this shining example of fairness and virtue and of the beneficent results flowing from trusts.

Further on the Government elaborates this point, not now in the mere lawyer's brief, but in the lawyer's brief that quotes the record and sets forth the documents.

The report I have just read was "approved and ordered placed on file" at a meeting of the executive committee at which were present Charles Deering, Cyrus H. McCormick, James Deering, William H. Jones, Harold F. McCormick, and J. J. Glessner. Each one of these gentlemen is still employed by the International Harvester Co. Those of you who think this trust has been reformed, that it has been regenerated, that it has been baptized, that it has seen a great light, remember that the men who set up that infamous scheme to crush a weaker rival, who were present and approved the plan—a plan that would have done credit to a buccaneer sailing the Spanish Main in the fourteenth century—are still the officers of this company. Of course there have been a few added since who can see nothing wrong in all it has done, and who are yet uncertain whether the original organization was not an act of good morals.

But I proceed; and at this point, in order that the record may be complete, I ask leave to print from the Government's brief the names of the defendants in the Government's suit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> International Harvester Co., International Harvester Co. of America, International Flax Twine Co., Wisconsin Steel Co., the Wisconsin Lumber Co., Illinois Northern Railway, the Chicago, West Pullman & Southern Railroad Co., Cyrus H. McCormick, Charles Deering, James Deering, John J. Glessner, William H Jones, Harold F. McCormick, Richard F. Howe, Edgar A. Bancroft, George F. Baker, William J. Louderback, Norman B. Ream, Charles Steele, John A. Chapman, Elbert H. Gary, Thomas D. Jones, John P. Wilson, William L. Saunders, George W. Perkins.

Mr. REED. I proceed. Here is a later sales report:

> Sales committee report of April 30 recommends some additional canvassing in Minnesota, the Dakotas, Iowa, Kansas, and Oklahoma to meet grass twine competition. Recommendations from the general agents for a plan to meet this competition were submitted, and the sales committee, after revising these plans, suggests the following allotment of men to the different divisions for this work, in accordance with the recommendations of paragraph 1 in report of April 30:
> McCormick division, 20; Deering division, 20; Champion division, 15; Plano division, 10; Milwaukee division, 10.
> These figures to represent the maximum and not to be reached unless the expense seems justifiable.

That report was also approved by the executive committee.

The record—

Says the Government—

contains other instances of action taken by the sales committee, to employ extra canvassing agents against the Minnie Co.

Finally the Government adds:

> No wonder the company was glad to sell out in the fall of 1903; it could not get capital to continue its business. For two years thereafter the International operated it as a fake "independent."

Mr. President and Senators, if there be a trick, a device, a method known for the propagation of trusts and the destruction of honest rivalry in business which has not been adopted by this concern, then I am not aware what that device may be; and yet, through all of it there runs a vein of cant and false pretense, a brand of hypocrisy that nauseates manhood and violates every idea of self-respect.

Here is a letter which Mr. O. W. Jones, one of these managers, sent out to the agents:

The International Harvester Co. of America has not been organized for the purpose of monopolizing or creating monopoly, and so no agent will have a monopoly on more than one machine on the International Harvester Co.'s lines.

Protesting that they were not organized for the purpose of monopoly, they refused to give to any one agent the agency for all their machines, thus compelling a number of agencies to be established in a city, or compelling the public to buy only one machine; but even if there were a number of agencies established in a city, they would all be agencies for the same concern, although each of them would have a different machine.

So this gentleman continues:

We believe that in the near future this great company—

After saying they were not organized for the purposes of monopoly—

We believe that in the near future this great company will do practically all the harvester business of the world, for the company is organized wisely and it is going to be, and is, managed on broad-gauged, unselfish principles.

Ah, how unselfish they were when they were sending out their "flying squadron" to crush their weaker rivals! How unselfish they were when they were lowering the prices in certain places to destroy competitors! How unselfish they were when they forced these struggling concerns over the precipice of bankruptcy in order that they might fatten upon the ruins that were left, while they occupied the field alone!

But I continue to read:

It is going to sell its goods for reasonable prices and deal justly with all men, employees, agents, and farmers, and that sort of treatment and operation will succeed everywhere. It is according to and in harmony with the divine plan.

Having reached out and gathered in all the agricultural business of the United States they now set up the pretense that Almighty God is their partner in the enterprise, or at least that they have a patent on divine plans.

Here is another excerpt illustrating some unfair competition, for I adopt that phrase for the present.

At their meeting held September 9, 1902—

It was decided that on an order for a carload of hayrakes for the use of one agent only it would be permissible to name a discount of $1 per rake when necessary to meet outside competition. If any cases arise where this is not sufficient to take the trade from outside competitors, the matter is to be brought up at a sales committee meeting for their consideration. Each division is to inform the other divisions of any sales made at less than schedule and give the price.

And so on.

CRUSHING COMPETITION.

I will not now take the time to read further. It would require hours to cover the field. I content myself in closing this particular branch of my remarks by reading from the hearings before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, held January 17, 1912, long enough ago to permit the light to penetrate into the heart and soul of any director of the company so that he need not have further notice by decree of courts. I read from page 38, "Undermining of independents":

The International Harvester Co., by spreading false and so-called confidential reports, led the dealers to believe that it had acquired control of independent manufacturers and would soon discontinue their models, thus driving the independent machines off the market.

That is another variety of fraudulent competition. I say to the distinguished chairman, who has in charge the bill covering unfair practices, that if he will just study the practices of the International Harvester Co. he can obtain a university education along that particular line of fraud and oppression. I continue to read:

The International Harvester Co., through its interlocking directorates and interests with the great Morgan and Rockefeller financial groups, has been able to dry up the channels of credit of its competitors and to overcome all resistance.

How true and how pointed now are the words of President Wilson, which I read in the early part of my remarks, wherein he warns us against the financial power that is centralized in this country. Here we find it manifest, and here, according to the evidence contained in the report of the House of Representatives, are the certain proofs of its existence and of its devestation:

The International Harvester Co. has secured a discrimination in the price of steel from the United States Steel Corporation, and the Steel Trust refunds to the Harvester Trust $3 a ton on all steel used in the manufacture of machinery exported, thus proving beyond a doubt that steel can be and is produced in this country and sold profitably at the foreign price; in other words, showing that the tariff on steel is indefensible.

I read further:

The International Harvester Co. receives rebates from the railroads both in the East and in the West.

This is a present charge, or was a present charge on January 17, 1912. If that be true, then here is another violation of the law. If that be correct, here is another act of felony. I read further:

The International Harvester Co. makes its agents pay transportation and other charges out of their commissions and then defrauds them in the computation of these charges.

That is unfair treatment, to say the least. I read further:

The International Harvester Co. has been guilty of legislature bribing and tax dodging.

BINDING-TWINE MONOPOLY.

The International Harvester Co. conspired to create and did create a binding-twine monopoly; it took advantage of the elimination of competition to reduce the quality of its goods, greatly to the detriment of the agricultural interests.

Why, of course. There never was a monopolist yet who kept up the standard of his output unless he was forced to do it by present competition or by threatened competition.

The International Harvester Co. has extended its operations to other implements, and is bending all its efforts—

When? In 1902? No. In 1909? No. In 1912, when this hearing by the House of Representatives took place, a body certainly of equal dignity and importance with this. At that time—

The International Harvester Co. has extended its operations to other implements, and is bending all its efforts to the establishment of a monopoly in the manufacture of cultivators, harrows, manure spreaders, wagons, cream separators, gasoline engines, etc.

Further, in addition to the above criminal or illicit acts, information of which is in the possession of the Department of Justice, the International Harvester Co. has directly hampered the farmers of the country and increased the cost of living by suppressing the best and most efficient machinery to continue the manufacture of models that gave a greater profit, and has maintained retail prices which by no method of reasoning can be justified by the cost of production.

We are not talking about something that happened in the remote past. We are not considering acts where the statute of limitations can be plead. We are not going back of present conditions. I am reading this evidence from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, because I believe it is entitled to respectful weight here.

Mr. VARDAMAN. When was the report made?

Mr. REED. The report was made January 17, 1912. [Reading:]

Since competition has been eliminated and a monopoly formed, the sole aim of the Harvester Trust has been to reduce its cost of manufacture and increase its profits, regardless of the interests of the farmers or of the country at large.

That does not refer to things that happened prior to 1909. That refers to things that were occurring up to the date of this report in 1912. You see the old pirate ship, the keel of which was laid with loving care by Perkins and Morgan and McCormick and Deering in 1902 still is sailing under the same black flag. It is commanded by the same officers, except as they occasionally put in a dummy who is willing to take orders and do their bidding. It is headed for the same port. It is as much deserving to be sunk now as it was the day it was launched. Those who man its decks and swarm through its yards are as well entitled to be tried, convicted, and punished as were the men who first gave its criminal hulk to the waters of the ocean of commerce.

Says this report:

The manner in which Mr. Perkins organized the Harvester Trust and the subterfuge he employed in his efforts to escape the meshes of the law were worthy of a man whose masterful mind has been whetted on the grindstone of corporation cunning. This is how he did it.

Then follows an account of the organization of this company, which is substantially as I have given it, and I ask leave to print it without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

At the beginning of 1902 there was keen competition between the various manufacturers of harvester machinery in the United States. The most powerful was the McCormick Harvester Machine Co., controlled by John D. Rockefeller, whose daughter is married to Harold F. McCormick.

Mr. Perkins, still flushed with the success of the billion dollar steel merger, proposed a plan for the merger of the harvester interests. He first approached Cyrus J. McCormick, who fell in with his views, and it was determined that McCormick should obtain an option on the entire capital stock of $1,000,000 of the Milwaukee Harvester Co., a Wisconsin corporation which manufactured the best and most efficient harvesting machine then invented, and was the only one of the larger firms in which the control was not centered in a few individuals.

The concentration of the harvester business in the hands of comparatively few firms, the concentration of the control of the principal competitors among a few stockholders, made the formation of a monopoly relatively easy. Rockefeller, through the McCormick family, controlled the McCormick machine; the Deering family controlled the Deering; the Jones family controlled the Piano; the Glessner family controlled the Champion.

In July, 1902, Cyrus J. McCormick exercised the option he had obtained on the stock of the Milwaukee company, and Mr. Perkins invited the McCormicks, the Deerings, the Joneses, and the Glessners to New York to effect the combination of their interests. The consolidation was discussed in the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co. and a preliminary agreement was reached. It was decided that the various manufacturers should return to their homes and make inventories of their plants. This they did.

TROUBLE OVER INVENTORIES.

They returned in two weeks with the inventories made, but all of them had valued their assets highly, and each interest, while sticking to its own valuation, stoutly refused to accept the valuations its competitors had placed on their plants. It appeared they would never agree.

But Mr. Perkins was equal to the situation. He conducted all the negotiations and devised and executed the plan finally agreed on. Mr. Perkins suggested that the harvester people should consolidate anyhow and leave the value of their various plants to be afterwards appraised at their full value by independent appraisers, and that all of the properties about to be merged should be immediately transferred to a trustee pending the appraisements.

Mr. Perkins then suggested that the five companies should not all be merged into the International Harvester Co., but that the separate corporate existence of one of them should be preserved, and for this he selected the Milwaukee.

MILLIONS OF WATER.

On August 12, 1902, the International Harvester Co. was organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey with a capital of $120,000,000, which was about $15,000,000 in excess of the most rosy figure at which the constituent companies had estimated their assets in the inventories.

On the same day all of the capital stock of the Milwaukee Harvester Co. and all of the property of the four other companies was conveyed to one William C. Lane as trustee, and subsequently conveyed by him to the International Harvester Co. At the same time all the capital stock of the International Harvester Co. was issued and delivered to Mr. Lane as trustee. On the next day Lane entered into a voting trust agreement with Cyrus J. McCormick, James Deering, and George W. Perkins as voting trustees, by the terms of which all the capital stock of the International Harvester Co. was transferred to this voting trust, with authority to exercise its voting power only, trust stock certificates to be issued by the voting trustees to the various parties entitled thereto.

TO MORGAN, $5,000,000.

The appraisements were made on a most liberal scale, and stock trust certificates issued by the voting trustees as follows:

To the stockholders of the McCormick Harvester Machine Co	$51,000,000
To the partners of the Deering Harvester Co	40,000,000
To the stockholders of the Piano Manufacturing Co	4,000,000
To the stockholders of the Wardner, Bushnell & Glessner Co	8,000,000
To Cyrus J. McCormick for the $1,000,000 stock of the Milwaukee Harvester Co	2,700,000
To J. P. Morgan & Co., for services	5,000,000
Balance sold for cash (to John D. Rockefeller and others)	9,300,000
Total	120,000,000

On August 14 the International Harvester Trust was doing business. It had its offices in Chicago, where all the business is done, and where its officers are all located, notable exceptions being Mr. Perkins and one other local director in New Jersey to comply with the law.

Then on September 5 Mr. Perkins completed his plans by changing the name of the Milwaukee Harvester Co. to the International Harvester Co. of America. The amount of its capital stock remained unchanged, $1,000,000. It had the same directors and almost the same name as the $120,000,000 International Harvester Co.

PERKINS ENLISTS PERKINS.

Mr. Perkins of the big International Harvester Co. then suggested to Mr. Perkins of the little International Harvester Co. of America that they enter into an agreement. This was done. The agreement is a very simple thing. The International Harvester Co. sells all its products at the price it likes to the International Harvester Co. of America, which in turn sells to the trade at a nominal profit.

By this altruistic device the International Harvester Co.—the trust—avoids participation in interstate commerce. It is purely a State concern; it does not come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. That, at least, was Mr. Perkins's intent.

The International Harvester Co. of America, on the other hand, with its small capitalization and its very modest profits, is the model corporation which does business in other States, and is required by the laws of many of them to render statements as to financial condition, profits, etc., and in some cases to pay taxes accordingly. Mr. Perkins has used the same device in Canada, where the International Harvester Co. of Canada (Ltd.) is a model corporation and sells at a modest profit to itself the products of its parent company.

The Harvester Co. of America is a straw corporation, all of the stock of which has been owned by the International Harvester Co. ever since August 13, 1902, when it still had its old name of the Milwaukee Harvester Co. All the stock of the International Harvester Co. of America is still owned by the International Harvester Co. It was and is merely a subterfuge to escape the jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

BUY PLANTS TO CLOSE THEM.

Immediately after the merger the International Harvester Co., the trust, acquired by purchase four of its principal competitors—D. M. Osborne & Co., for $4,000,000; Aultman, Miller & Co., for $700,000; the Minneapolis Harvester Co., for $700,000; and the Keystone Co., for $460,000. The plants of the Minneapolis company, manufacturing the "Minnie" harvester, and of Aultman, Miller & Co., manufacturing the "Buckeye," were at once shut down, the two plants having been bought for $1,400,000, simply to destroy them. In less than one year from the establishment of the trust it controlled more than 90 per cent of the total harvester business of the United States.

The only independents of any consequence left were the Acme Harvester Machine Co., the Walter A. Wood Harvester Co., the Johnson Harvester Co., and the Adriance Platt Co. Of these the most important was the Acme, but the Department of Justice has its doubts as to whether it is not secretly controlled by the trust.

Mr. Perkins, having created his trust and laid the basis of a complete monopoly in "everything the farmer buys," then proceeded to "cinch the farmers." Trade conditions and the patent laws made it easy.

Mr. REED. The report further on charges under the heading "Rebates from railroads":

But Mr. Perkins, who, as he admitted under oath to Attorney General Major, of Missouri, controlled the entire business of the International Harvester Co., was not content with profits alone. He wanted rebates from the railroads, and he got them.

The information in the possession of the Department of Justice shows that the International Harvester Co. receives rebates from the railroads of both the East and the West. It gets a rebate of $6 a car in thousands from eastern railroads. This payment is made through the legal department of the railroads to some individual, ostensibly for legal services. The Harvester Trust gets the money.

In the West, where the International Harvester Co. owns short terminal railways connecting its factories with the railroads, the terminal allowance system was used to cover up rebates. A switching charge of $12 a car was billed against the railroads in 1906. But at last the railroads refused to stand for this; so Mr. Perkins invented a new plan.

The Harvester Trust, which has large warehouses in the West, made arrangements with the railroad companies to defraud its agents, who are obliged to pay transportation and other charges out of their commissions. The plan was as follows: The railroads billed against the agent the local tariff from Chicago to the intermediate warehouse, then a charge of $5 for transfer, and then the local tariff from the intermediate warehouse to the point of destination. They then refunded the Harvester Trust the $5 transfer charge plus the difference between the through rate and the aggregate of the two local rates.

Under the head, "Perkins deals with Perkins," I find this:

But profits and rebates were not enough for Mr. Perkins. He wanted more, and he got it from the Steel Trust. Mr. Perkins, chairman of the finance committee of the International Harvester Co., obtained from Mr. Perkins, chairman of the finance committee of the United States Steel Corporation, a special rate on all steel used by the Harvester Trust and a refund of $3 a ton on all steel used in the manufacture of machinery exported. The prices of raw material were manipulated with a discriminating favor murderous to those who dared to compete with the International Harvester Co.

Mr. Perkins, chairman of the finance committee of the International Harvester Co., was also able to obtain from Mr. Perkins, member of the New York Clearing House committee, accurate information as to the financial standing and the loans of the independent harvester companies.

MR. JONES.

Is it not strange that all this could go on; that it was cried from the housetops; that a wayfaring man, though a fool, could see it; and yet there is only one man left in the United States who can not see it until the court shall some day so adjudge it? Is it not marvelous that one so obtuse should be a member of the great Jones family? There was no other—just Jones. He alone, like a bat lurking in the shadows, "drops his blue-fringed lids" and, looking toward the plain, bald fact, "cries out, where is it?" That is a bad paraphrase of Milton. I apologize. Jones can not be convinced. He is not willing to say its original organization was wrong. Although it has been thrice condemned by the courts, although condemned by this report of the House of Representatives, although condemned at the bar of public conscience, although charged by the Government solemnly in suits to be a criminal against the law, but one man in all this world is not convinced. His name is Jones.

I continue to read:

Mr. Perkins, chairman of the finance committee of the International Harvester Co., was also able to obtain from Mr. Perkins, member of the New York Clearing House committee, accurate information as to the financial standing and the loans of the independent harvester companies. The banks which had made loans or were handling the business of the independents were controlled either by Morgan, whose partner Mr. Perkins then was, or by Rockefeller, who is equally interested in the fortunes of the International Harvester Co. The independent manufacturers, paying higher prices for their raw material, with their credit at the mercy of their giant competitor, were forced either to sell out or go to the wall.

I have read that a second time. I should like to have it read every morning until the Senate is inspired to action that will help sweep these combinations out of existence; until a public sentiment shall be aroused that will make it impossible for men to conspire to destroy the property of their neighbors; until a time shall arrive when he who is guilty of acts like these will be classed with the common thief and the highwayman. I read on:

FARMERS AT MERCY OF TRUST.

To-day Mr. Perkins's methods have placed the International Harvester Co. in control of the agricultural resources of the United States. The trust makes the plows, the disks, the harrows with which the soil is prepared. It makes the seeders and the drills. It makes the mowers, the hayrakes, the corncutters, the corn shredders, the headers, the reapers, the binders, the harvesters, the engines, the windmills, the wagons, the hoes, the rakes, the forks, the spades, the dairy machinery and implements used to produce almost all the $9,000,000,000 worth of farm and agricultural wealth which is the backbone of the prosperity of this country.

Mr. President, these statements that I have read are incorporated in this report and were from the New York World of July 24, 1911, and are accepted by the committee as of evidentiary value.

Before I conclude my remarks, and because the question was asked me, I want to put into the RECORD a tabulation from the report of the Department of Commerce and Labor, at page 254, which shows the prices of farm machinery to have been raised.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to follows.

The following table shows the general contract wholesale prices for specified grain binders, mowers, and corn binders in the chief grain States of the West from 1903 to 1911:

Contract list prices, f. o. b. Chicago, for two fall payments of specified Deering harvesting machines, by years, 1903–1911.

Machine.	1903	1904	1905	1906	1907	1908	1909	1910	1911
Grain binder:
6-foot	$100.00	$100.00	$100.00	$100.00	$100.00	$107.50	$107.50	$107.50	$107.50
7-foot	103.00	103.00	103.00	103.00	103.00	110.50	110.50	110.50	110.50
8-foot	115.00	115.00	115.00	115.00	120.00	130.00	130.00	130.00	130.00
Mower:
5-foot regular	36.00	36.00	36.00	36.00	36.00	38.50	38.50	38.50	38.50
5-foot vertical	37.00	37.00	37.00	37.00	37.00	39.50	39.50	39.50	39.50
6-foot	39.00	39.00	39.00	39.00	39.00	42.00	42.00	42.00	42.00
Corn binder	100.00	100.00	100.00	100.00	100.00	107.50	107.50	107.50	107.50

An inspection of the foregoing table shows that for 6 and 7 foot grain binders the only change in the regular contract prices was in 1908, when they were advanced $7.50. This advance does not take any account, of course, of the fact that the company also began to require payment, generally, for attachments which previously were usually thrown in gratis. (See p. 250.) The 8-foot grain binders, on the other hand, were advanced $5 in 1907 and $10 additional in 1908, giving a total advance during this period of $15.

The changes in the prices of mowers were parallel to those for 6 and 7 foot grain binders, only one advance being made, namely, $2.50 for the 5-foot mowers and $3 for the 6-foot mowers.

The list price of corn binders was the same as that of 6-foot grain binders in each year, advancing $7.50 in 1908.

The contract prices of harvesting machines shown above, while given specifically for Deering brands, were also applicable to the McCormick brands of harvesting machines of the corresponding kinds and sizes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say in conclusion. I could stand here and mass facts of the character I have presented from now until to-morrow's sun might rise. I have said enough, however, to convince all men who are open to conviction of the character of this institution. I shall be prepared to defend these statements whenever any man has the temerity to rise here and on behalf of the Harvester Trust challenge aught I have said.

So far as I am concerned, my fight against monopoly has been a good-faith fight, and my fight against monopoly is not upon narrow or personal lines. I believe that where monopoly exists liberty is dead just to the extent that monopoly is potential. When I have attended conventions and voted for platforms declaring that monopoly is indefensible and intolerable; when I have attended conventions and voted for platforms declaring that the criminal provisions of the law ought to be enforced; when I have tossed my hat in the air and joined with the cheers of the multitude, as from the lips of Bryan and Clark and all other great Democrats, including the President himself, has come the demand for personal responsibility and for personal punishment for personal guilt—when I have acclaimed those sentiments, I have done it in good faith.

I am about to vote in the Senate for a bill wrought out here in the summer's heat declaring that the directors of corporations shall be held personally and criminally responsible for the criminal acts of the corporation. I shall, sir, keep the faith; I will not say in one breath that men should be made felons for their acts and in the next declare they should be the recipients of honorable distinction. I do not possess that quality of mind which enables me to insist that a man should look out upon the world through the bars of a cell and at the same moment insist that he should stand among the honored and the great.

Mr. President, the Democratic Party has a splendid history. Its foundation stones were laid by the master builder of all the ages—Thomas Jefferson. It has from that day to this hour been the enemy of privilege, the enemy of every scheme and device that sets up and creates a special privilege. Those who fight for special privilege fight against Democracy; those who advantage the enemies of Democracy fight for special privilege.

Mr. President, I have done, and I have done my duty.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there are two amendments pending, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are no amendments pending.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, I offer these two amendments. They sprang out of an amendment which was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] with reference to the antitrust laws, to the effect that the creation of the interstate trade commission should not in any way affect the antitrust laws. The amendment which the Senator from Iowa offered was divided into two parts, one being an addition to section 5 and the other being an additional section.

The addition to section 5 is as follows:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Section 11 provides:

That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent or interfere with the enforcement of the provisions of the antitrust acts or the acts to regulate commerce, nor shall anything contained in the act be construed to alter, modify, or repeal the said antitrust acts or the acts to regulate commerce or any part or parts thereof.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what the record shows, but during the course of some observations I presented not long ago I offered an amendment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was in error. The Secretary informs the Chair that the Senator from Iowa did offer an amendment, and the Senator from Nevada offered a substitute for that amendment, which is the pending question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought that was the state of the record.

Mr. President, the two amendments which have now been offered by the chairman of the committee cover exactly the ground which I sought to cover in the amendment offered some time ago. I therefore ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw the amendment which I offered and allow the chairman of the committee to offer his two amendments directly to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has a right to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I ask the consideration, first, of the proviso at the end of section 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 5, the following——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is not offering that to be voted upon to-night?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Kenyon	Page	Smoot
Burton	Kern	Pittman	Stone
Camden	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Thomas
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Thornton
Cummins	Lewis	Shafroth	Walsh
Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	West
Hughes	Myers	Shively	White
James	Nelson	Simmons

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia answered to their names when called.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] has been called from the Chamber on a very important matter. He is necessarily absent temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

RECESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, the Senate stands in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The Senate thereupon (at 6 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, July 24, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

THURSDAY, July 23, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts to Thee in gratitude, Almighty God our Father, for all the disclosures Thou hast made of Thyself. That we may know somewhat of Thy wisdom Thou hast displayed most marvelously the wonderful adaptation of means to ends. That we may know somewhat of Thy power Thou hast spread out before us the vast and stupendous heavens, all of which move in harmony with Thy will. That we may know somewhat of Thy love Thou hast bound us together into families by the tender ties of affection which time nor space can sever, all of which are reassuring.

May we hallow Thy name by a faithful service in the things whereunto Thou hast called us, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report (No. 997, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) by Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, from the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, relative to the report of the president of the United States Civil Service Commission in House Document No. 245, Sixty-third Congress, first session; the report of the Secretary of the Department of the Interior in House Document No. 912, Sixty-third Congress, second session; and the report of the Secretary of War in House Document No. 1005, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which report was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned on Tuesday the matter in controversy was the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill; and the particular matter was the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to recede and concur in Senate amendment 145.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky suggests the absence of a quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. There is no use pretending to count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 240 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I am going to make a charge of sharp practice being made here this morning on the part of one of the attachés of the House, who, at the behest of the gentleman from California, is pairing absent Members with Members who are present for the purpose of affecting the vote on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Neither the House nor the Speaker nor the gentleman from Connecticut has any control over pairs. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Very often in parliamentary procedure a motion to lay on the table carries the substantive measure with it. Why does it not do it in this case?

The SPEAKER. Because it is not an amendment. If an amendment is laid on the table, it tables the whole thing.

Mr. MURDOCK. And this tables only the motion itself?

The SPEAKER. This is a summary proceeding. Usually the Member makes the motion to reconsider and lay on the table in one motion, but there is nothing pending before the House at this particular instance except the motion. The other day, in the hurry of the proceedings, and it being the first time that a request to sever such a motion has been made since the present occupant of the Chair has been in the House, the Chair erroneously put the first half of the proposition first.

Mr. SHERLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the motion to lay on the table is voted down, does the question recur on the motion to reconsider the vote to appropriate this money for the San Francisco exposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the motion to lay on the table is voted down, does not that bring up the question of reconsideration?

The SPEAKER. Yes; on the question of reconsideration the other night the House adjourned because it could not get a quorum. The question is on the motion to table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker having decided on Tuesday that the question was on the motion to reconsider, and the House having ordered the yeas and nays on that, is it not too late to correct the error?

The SPEAKER. The situation was that no quorum developed, and the whole proceeding was absolutely nugatory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The ordering of the yeas and nays was not nugatory.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to reconsider, and the Chair had forgotten that. What is the query of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. The Speaker having decided on Tuesday, as the Speaker now thinks erroneously, that the question was on the motion to reconsider, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on that question, is it not too late to correct the ruling?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under that state of the case the vote ought to be taken on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the parliamentary situation, after the item had been agreed to the gentleman from California moved to reconsider and lay that motion on the table. There was great confusion in the House at the time, due to the fact that there was not a quorum present. The Speaker said the motion before the House was the motion to reconsider. Probably if the gentleman from California had made the point of order at the time the question before the House was to lay the motion on the table, I have no doubt the Speaker would have ruled with him.

The SPEAKER. Of course he would; and if the Chair had had a few minutes to think of the matter, he would have put the other motion first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But without objection, without the point of order having been made, the motion to lay on the table was passed over practically by unanimous consent, and we come to the question of reconsideration; and as there is no desire to debate that question, it seems to me that it would expedite business, the yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion now before the House, the question of reconsideration.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would it be in order now to move to lay the motion on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion has already been made. If the vote on the motion to reconsider goes one way, it ends it, and if it goes the other, it does not. The Chair thinks, on the whole, that the vote ought to be taken on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the vote is taken on the motion to reconsider and it is voted to reconsider, then the question comes on the original motion for the House to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion of the gentleman from California was agreed to. The yeas and nays are ordered on it, and the Clerk will call the roll. All those in favor of reconsidering the vote whereby the motion of the gentleman from California was agreed to will answer "aye," and those opposed will answer "no."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have already voted upon this proposition to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. But no quorum developed on that vote, and we must take the vote again, de novo.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, what was the result of the original vote taken on this? What was the outcome of the vote?

The SPEAKER. The motion made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] carried.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 108, nays 134, answered "present" 9, not voting 181, as follows:

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
T. U. SISSON,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question about amendment No. 121, proposing to pay the American Surety Co. something like $100,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House receded from that.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The House receded from that? I believe the amendment was inserted by the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House agreed to the amendment.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Why have the House managers agreed to it? I would like to know something in regard to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the American Surety Co. was the defendant in an action brought by the United States against it as surety on a bond. Judgment was rendered against the surety company for $100,358.05, and the American Surety Co. paid that sum over to the Government under protest, and an appeal was taken from the judgment rendered. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment and directed that there should be a new trial. Upon the matter being presented again to the district court the petition of the Government was dismissed. Under these circumstances, the money having been paid in satisfaction of a judgment which has been overturned and the petition of the United States having been dismissed, it seemed to the managers upon the part of the House that the company was entitled to have this money back; and particularly is that true since no attempt has been made to make any allowance for interest during the time the money has been in the possession of the United States.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I will ask the gentleman, if he will permit me, why he considers this a proper item to put in a deficiency bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the circumstances stated I think we should give this money back to the company. I understand there had been some objection from some sources because there is a controversy about the compensation to some attorneys in the litigation, but that is a matter to be determined between the attorneys and the company. It is a company which paid into the Treasury the amount of a judgment rendered against it. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment, and upon a retrial the petition was dismissed and the Solicitor General of the United States states that the money should be returned to the company. It is our duty to return it as speedily as possible.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The company took the precaution to preserve its rights by its protest.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Since the gentleman adverted to the question of attorneys' fees I will say that this litigation was initiated in my State of Louisiana and that I am familiar with it, and I think the return of the money is perfectly proper under these circumstances, but the American Surety Co. received from the Sandstone & Gravel Co., on which it was a bondsman, certain sums of money and certain bonds as indemnity and now refuses to adjust its affairs with its principal, and under those circumstances it did seem to me that the rights of other persons in interest should be protected. The Government, in restoring this money to its lawful owners, ought to see that it goes to the lawful owners and not simply to the surety company.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the trouble is that we can not determine such conflicting claims. Of course, the defendant in the action who paid the money was the American Surety Co. I doubt if Congress is able to determine the questions which may arise between the surety company and the persons for whom it acts as surety. The question of adjusting such rights is hardly a thing which can be done by Congress.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yet in view of the fact that such a condition exists, it occurs to me that there is no necessity for such haste in attaching this amendment to the general deficiency bill and asking the House here, without any knowledge of the subject, to acquiesce in the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, in view of the facts in the case and the statement of the Solicitor General of the United States that the money should be paid back to the company, and the fact that it is proposed to give it back to them without interest during the period it has been in the possession of the Government, it seems to me we are not doing anything too much for this company. We have no right to the money.

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I ask the gentleman where the hearings were? Were they before the House Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were no hearings before the committee. This information was obtained by the managers upon the part of the House before we consented to agree to the amendment, and the agreement was upon the representations upon the part of the Department of Justice that in its opinion the money should go back.

Mr. DUPRÉ. It seems to me they are displaying great consideration for this company——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. DUPRÉ. While ordinary claimants have to knock at the doors of the Congress for a long time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I had paid money under judgment to the Government and the courts had finally determined that the judgment was erroneous and that the Government was not entitled to the money, the least I could expect would be to get it back as quickly as possible, particularly if I were not to be paid interest for the period during which the Government had possession of the money.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I know there are many claims as meritorious as this that have never been engrafted on a bill of this character and put through the House in this way. I do not mean there is anything shady about this claim, of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. The general deficiency bill carries all judgments against the Government. Now, what is this item? If it be not a judgment against the United States, then the company is not entitled to this money. It was paid pursuant to judgment rendered by the court. This bill is filled with items of judgments of the United States courts, judgments of the Court of Claims, judgments in Indian depredation claims, and audited and certified claims. Those are items that properly belong on this bill. There is no question but that this company is entitled to the return of this money from the Government. As to any dispute that may arise or may exist, or any claim that may properly be made against the company by some one who is not involved in the matter between the Government and the company, we have no knowledge, and we attempt to avoid taking cognizance of it.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. OGLESBY. There has been no question raised as to the solvency of this company?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The managers on the part of the House insisted on knowing whether upon this decision of the lower court, by which the petition of the Government was dismissed, there was any question if upon appeal the Government might be successful. But the Solicitor General of the United States had notified the Senate that the money should be returned to the company. The American Surety Co., I suppose, is among the most solvent surety companies in the United States. There can be no question that if the Government has any claim against it for $100,000 it is amply able to meet it. We have taken their money under a judgment and we have held it. The courts have decided they should not have paid it, and we are returning it to them, and we are not giving them any interest for the period during which they have been deprived of the use of the money.

Mr. OGLESBY. And even if the Government should act as a ward for these other claims, since the company is perfectly solvent, it would be only a matter of holdup on their part to compel a settlement with the company?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not want to go that far. I think if there is a dispute now as to whether the American Surety Co. or somebody else is actually entitled to this money, under the procedure in the District of Columbia that can be determined and the money impounded while the question is being litigated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask the conferees in regard to amendment No. 117, adopted by the Senate, which has been stricken out of the conference report. It is for furniture equipment of the new customhouse in Boston, $75,000. This item was inserted by the Senate owing to the fact that the building is practically completed and will be ready for occupancy by January 1. I would like to inquire why this item is stricken out, which was inserted with the idea of securing steel furniture for the new building and having it ready by the time the building is to be occupied on January 1.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House conferees insisted upon that item being eliminated because the sundry civil appropriation bill carries $825,000 for furniture and repairs to furniture for public buildings.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether in this $825,000 any part is estimated for the furnishing of the Boston customhouse?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to state. It can be spent upon any building that is to be furnished, and as much spent upon any building as desired. The committee does not believe it is good policy to insert special items for special buildings. Last year a request was pressed very hard for a specific appropriation of $150,000 to furnish the New York post office, then recently completed.

The Committee on Appropriations insisted that the general appropriation for furniture be used for that purpose. That building was furnished out of the general appropriation without making the special appropriation of $150,000. There is no reason that can be advanced for a singling out of some particular building for a specific appropriation for furniture. Eight hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is carried in the sundry civil bill, and can be spent upon any building, and as these buildings become ready for furniture the department will proceed to furnish them. There is another objection to appropriating specifically for any building. I suppose the most indefensible expenditure of public money that has ever come under my observation has been for the furnishing of the customhouse in the city of New York. The character of the furniture and the price paid for it were absolutely without justification. If a specific sum be appropriated for a particular building for furniture, the department officials seem to proceed upon the theory that it is their duty to expend the entire amount for the furniture, and the character of the furniture is determined by the amount of money placed at their disposal. An effort has been made and has been successful, and it is being perfected from year to year, by which furniture in public buildings shall be standardized and suitable furniture for public offices shall be installed in all public offices of the same character. There is furniture in the New York customhouse that would be creditable to the palaces of any of the effete monarchs of Europe, and it is so wholly out of place in a public office of the United States that it arouses the indignation of everyone who sees it.

We did not wish to have a repetition of that situation at any place in the United States. If $75,000 is needed to furnish the Boston customhouse, it can be spent out of the $825,000 general appropriation. If $100,000 be needed, it can be spent out of that appropriation. Whatever sum is necessary is available for that purpose.

Mr. TREADWAY. Has the gentleman any information as to how the department reaches the conclusion making the figures $825,000, and whether or not in that estimate Boston is included?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They really asked for $1,000,000. Last year they asked for $900,000 in the general appropriation and $150,000 additional for the post office at New York City. They succeeded in furnishing the New York post office out of the $900,000 without any specific appropriation, and in view of the fact that there was no other building coming into commission that would require furniture of such an expensive character, the committee believed that with the observance of proper economy the department would probably have all the money it required, or so nearly so that whatever additional money might possibly be required could, upon proper showing made, be provided in the deficiency bill at the next session of Congress without delaying in any respect any building. The next session of Congress adjourns on the 4th of March, and there will be three months from that time during which expenditures will be made on public buildings.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. I would like to ask one question in the same connection. There is nothing to prevent the Treasury Department from spending anything that is necessary under the $825,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They can spend all of it if necessary. The appropriation is for that purpose. It is to furnish public buildings; and they will be furnished when they come into commission.

It is suggested that unless a special appropriation is made for the Boston customhouse it will be permitted to stand idle, unfurnished, because while it is ready for occupancy the money will be needed for some buildings to come into commission in May or at some other time. I can not assume that the business of the department will be conducted in such an idiotic manner. I believe the money will be expended for the furniture that is required; and if not enough money has been given, Congress will do what has been its custom—give the requisite money when the time comes.

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman as to the Martinsburg, W. Va., item, on page 11, Senate amendment numbered 62? There is an appropriation there of $20,000 to install an elevator. This is a very antiquated building, of old style, and really the people there ought to have a new building. The department is very anxious to have an elevator constructed to the fourth floor, where they now have to climb up flights of stairs. I think it a meritorious case. The gentleman will find it on page 11, amendment 62.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there were two public-buildings items included in this bill by the Senate which have not been agreed to. One is for the building at Martinsburg, W. Va., referred to by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BROWN]. It was not agreed to because no estimate had been submitted for it. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of public buildings said that it was not needed, and if it were appropriated it could not be expended.

The first reason was sufficient for the Members of the House; that is, that it could not be expended, because it could not be reached in the order of the arrangement to be followed in time to be used next December. There are some 20 items, in which is included the Martinsburg item, which in all probability will be requested at the session of Congress that commences in December.

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia. I am very glad of that. It is an appropriation that is badly needed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no doubt that the situations as to some of these buildings are perhaps somewhat pressing. The policy of the Committee on Appropriations has been one that is absolutely fair to all of the Members of the House. That policy is to give all of the money requested by the department for public buildings and sites which the department says can be used before the next bill becomes a law, and to insist that no other items be placed in the bill. If an item be placed in the bill at the request of one Member or one Senator, it is an injustice to everyone else who has items that can not be inserted, and it causes confusion and embarrassment and difficulty. We try to be absolutely fair in the manner in which we recommend these items.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I would like to ask my colleague from New York why the two items on pages 22 and 23, amendments numbered 119 and 120, were eliminated? These are the items that make appropriations of $5,000 in each case for the Association for the Blind in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were eliminated because it has been the policy not to have the general deficiency bill or urgent deficiency bill used as courts of appeal from other committees. These items were included in the District of Columbia appropriation bill by the Senate. They were considered by the conferees, by the representatives on the part of the House who had charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and they insisted that these items be eliminated. The representatives on the part of the House on the District bill were the men most familiar with the situation. When the same amendments were placed on the deficiency bill the managers on the part of the House took the position that the matter had been settled and that we would not carry on this bill items for the current service of any department of the Government that had already been passed upon and determined by those in charge of the bills to which they properly belong if they should be appropriated for at all. For that reason the items were eliminated.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is but one amendment undisposed of in this bill. It is amendment numbered 158, and I ask that the Clerk be directed to report the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 158, page 59, line 23: "The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby directed to adjust, settle, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed in all the sum of $175,000, to officers of the Army, their heirs or legal representatives, pay as commutation for longevity rations, or other pay or allowances that may be due said officers, their heirs or legal representatives, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding, which claims have been heretofore barred from adjustment and settlement by section 3480, United States Revised Statutes, repealed by act of Congress approved July 6, 1914."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment just read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think this is an amendment that ought to be concurred in. I do not like to differ with the chairman of the committee, but I think the House should understand this amendment, and I think it ought to be concurred in. I would like to make the preferential motion that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] makes the preferential motion that the House recede and concur in the amendment just read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman from Alabama want some time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to have five minutes, unless I have to yield to somebody for reply. Then I may ask the gentleman later on for more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this proposition it is this: A number of years ago Congress passed a law that allowed officers in the United States Army additional pay for each five years of their service in the Army. It was contended that the service at West Point should be included in the five years, which contention was contested by the comptroller or by one of the departments. The case went on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the four years at West Point should be included in the time of service for the allowance of this pay. Under that decision a large number of officers in the United States Army received their additional compensation, based on the four years' service at West Point. I am informed that the amount that was paid out for that reason amounted to something like a million dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were certain officers in the United States Army who resigned while this question was pending in the Supreme Court, and after resigning from the United States Army joined the Confederate Army. Of course when the decision was rendered they were ineligible to make a claim by reason of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, which prohibited any officer who resigned from the United States Army to enter the Confederate Army from making any claim of this kind. But within the last month the House has passed a bill, on the motion of a distinguished gentleman who occupies a seat on the other side of the House and who made one of the most eloquent pleas to this House that I have ever listened to. This bill authorizes these soldiers, their heirs or their widows, to make the claim under existing law; that is, that an officer who served at West Point and subsequently resigned and went into the Confederate Army shall for his service before he resigned be placed on the same footing as his brother officers in the United States Army. There can be no question about what Congress intended, because here is the report made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] when he presented this bill to the House, in which report he says:

In the passage of this bill there is no question of opening up any other claims—

That is, no other claims except these claims of officers who resigned—

Nothing will be opened up by the repeal of section 3480 by the language of the proposed act except certain claims which can be presented to the Office of the Auditor for the War Department covering pay due some 173 persons accruing prior to April 13, 1861. These persons were West Point graduates, who were afterwards officers in the Confederate service. The claims total about $165,000.

Now, this proposition does not ask Congress to decide the case. Congress in its liberality and in its justice has already decided the case. It does not come from this side of the House. It does not come from the South, but comes, as I say, on the motion of a distinguished Member of this House and a member of the Republican Party, Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, on whose motion the Congress itself has already decided that these claims shall be paid.

Now what is there to be determined? There is only to be determined the question whether the man was at West Point and was in the Union Army. That is a matter of record. There can be no dispute about it one way or the other. The only other question is the amount of additional pay that he should receive by decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which amount his brother officers who served with him have already got, and that is only a question of an auditor figuring the amount. Now, it can not embrace anybody else. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] points out, it can only embrace these men. The only thing to be determined is a question of record fact, as to the length of the man's service, and whether he was in the Army.

Now, you may answer that and say that when this fact is ascertained it will be time for Congress to make the appropriation; and possibly in an ordinary case that might be true. But as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] said in his eloquent speech, this act wiped out the last barrier that stood between the South and the North. This bill passed, not by a partisan vote, not by partisan efforts, not as the result of some claims lobby, but by the unanimous vote of a Congress that wanted to say that there is but one flag and one country. Now, after Congress has written this law on the statute book, it is only a question as to whether we shall pay these old soldiers or their widows to-day or next December, when the auditor has ascertained their names and figured up the amounts. Whether we shall pay them then or pay them to-day is the only question which confronts Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They can not receive this money until the auditor ascertains the facts; and there is some reason why they should get it to-day instead of next winter, because many of them have reached that point in life when the span of their days may be measured between the adjournment of this session and the meeting of the next. It is only a few hundred dollars apiece. It does not amount to much. But these few hundred dollars may be of inestimable value to these old soldiers, or to their widows, in their declining days. Why should we hesitate now, when we have already determined that we will pay the amount? Why withhold it, when under the law that we passed we must pay it next fall?

Let me call attention to some of the distinguished officers who, although they may not have served on the side that this House recognized during the war between the States, yet bear names and places in history cherished by every American citizen, no matter on which side of that controversy his allegiance may have fallen. Every American citizen cherishes their names and their memories as worthy of American manhood, and as soldiers whose reputations are untarnished and whose names will live in the history of the people of our Republic. [Applause.]

The soldiers whose heirs will receive a few hundred dollars from this appropriation are Gen. Robert E. Lee, of Virginia; Gen. P. G. T. Beauregard, of Louisiana; Gen. J. E. B. Stuart, of Virginia; Gen. Dick Ewell, of Virginia; Gen. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama; and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, of Virginia; and the widows of Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson, of North Carolina; Gen. Simon Buckner, of Kentucky; Gen. Bell, of South Carolina; and Gen. A. P. Hill, of Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, a recital of those names is sufficient, in my judgment, to authorize the passage of the appropriation; and I think that, now that Congress has passed a just law in recognition of the wiping out of the past, Congress should not hesitate at this time to make this appropriation and let these old soldiers and their widows have these few hundred dollars that may not reach them if we postpone action in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I understood this case as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] does, I should be for his proposition. But unfortunately he has had his attention attracted to this matter only recently, and he is now favoring the proposition upon the theory that this measure is to do justice only to certain Confederate soldiers who had been officers of the United States Army. That is not the case at all. Let me very briefly endeavor to outline what is before the House. In 1838 Congress passed a law providing for longevity pay, providing that officers in the Army who had served five years should have their pay increased 10 per cent, and an increase of 10 per cent for each five years of service until the increase amounted to 40 per cent. That is still the law. That law was passed in 1838. It was construed by the Government for many years, and no change in the construction was made until the eighties. We had a military academy at West Point where the Members of Congress sent cadets. The Government paid the expenses of the cadets. After four years at the Military Academy—and the same thing is true after six years' service at the Naval Academy—the boy came out of the academy and received a commission in the Army or the Navy.

The department construed the law to be that the date of service commenced when the commission was granted, after he came out of the Military Academy, and did not count the four years of service at the Military Academy, or the six years of service at the Naval Academy in determining the longevity pay.

In other words, if the six years of service at the Naval Academy was to be included as service in the Navy, when the boy received his commission as an ensign he was already entitled to his first longevity pay, an increase of 10 per cent over the amount provided by law, on the ground that he had been more than five years in the service.

This was the construction of the department and the Government from 1838 until along in the eighties. It never was questioned. The Government said that the service in the Army and the Navy upon which to compute longevity pay did not begin when the boy entered the academy, but began when he came out and went into the Army or the Navy. To an ordinary man that would seem like a sensible construction. But some genius in the course of time conceived the idea that the military and naval service commenced when the boy entered the academy, and a claim was made against the Government, which went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court decided that the service did commence when the boy entered the academy and that longevity pay was to be computed accordingly. In other words, the boy who came out of the Military Academy received his 10 per cent increase after he had been in the Army one year instead of five years, computing the four years at West Point; and in the Navy it commenced at once, because he had already been five years in the service of the Navy.

Congress changed that law recently and said that the service at West Point should not count in fixing longevity pay. When the Supreme Court made this decision all of the officers who were in the service practically filed their claims in the Court of Claims and received the allowance for the increase of longevity pay which had occurred within six years, as under the law the statute of limitations barred all claims more than six years old. Ever since that time these claims have been floating around Congress. The Senate has on more than one occasion put these claims upon the omnibus claims bill. They never have received a vote in the House on any previous occasion. No one has ever defended them in the House. The Senate sent a lot of these claims to the Court of Claims for findings, and the court made the finding of facts that the man entered the service at a certain time, was in the service a certain length of time, and that if the decision of the Supreme Court was to be followed by Congress his increase in longevity pay would be so much.

These claims are not confined to the Confederate officers who have been in the Army of the United States. They apply to all officers who have been in the Army at any time, and by like comparison are applied to all officers who have been in the Navy. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] believes that the claims only apply to these Confederate officers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman, if he will allow me—I would not mislead anybody——

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman would not, and I am coming to what I think is in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This proposition is limited to officers who are affected by section 3480, and only Confederate officers can be affected by that statute.

Mr. MANN. We recently passed a law repealing section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. That section did not as a matter of fact bar any of these claims, but some of the very shrewd claim agents who have been urging these claims for years thought that if they could repeal that statute, which was intended to shut out claims of Confederate soldiers against the Government, they could pursue the very course which is now being pursued, and commit the Government to the payment of these claims. I said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who had this bill in the House, that it amounted to nothing, that it did not do anything; but if anybody wanted to repeal any provision of the law that appeared to discriminate against the Confederate soldier I was quite willing to vote for that proposition.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. When was the decision of the Supreme Court rendered to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. MANN. It was some time, I think, in 1884. It is the United States against Tyler, One hundred and fifth United States.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. When was the statute changed? I understood the gentleman to say that after the Supreme Court decision Congress passed a law providing that the service at West Point should not count.

Mr. MANN. The statute was changed in the last Congress.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman whether the statute applied to the Naval Academy as well as to West Point?

Mr. MANN. We changed it as to the Military Academy, and I am not sure whether it was also changed as to the Naval Academy or not, but I think it was.

Mr. GARNER. It seems to me anomalous that it should be changed with reference to the Military Academy and not with reference to the Naval Academy.

Mr. MANN. The Military Academy was included in the Army bill from the Military Committee. I know the same proposition was before the Naval Committee, but I am not sure whether it was passed or not. It is not important except to show the opinion of Congress as to the ruling of the Supreme Court. This is one of the cases that is pending. You can not pay the Confederate soldiers who have these claims and refuse to pay the Union soldiers who have these claims, and while this proposition in this pending amendment, it is true, only pays the Confederate soldiers who had the claims, it is nonsense to say that we can do that and then refuse to pay the Union soldiers who had the claims. No one would claim that. No portion of the claims has yet been paid to anyone.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. As I understand the contention of the gentleman from Illinois, the act passed the other day at the instance of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] did not enlarge or affect the rights of all these claimants, but merely removed such disabilities as had been imposed upon those claimants who had been in the Confederate Army.

Mr. MANN. That is all. Those people did not have any claim against the Government which could be enforced, because it was barred by the statute of limitations in any event; and the only way they could ever get their money is by a new provision of law authorizing its payment and waiving the statute of limitations, so that they are not in any different position by reason of the law passed the other day from what they would be in if this law were passed without the other law having been passed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is familiar with section 3480 of the Revised Statutes passed in 1867?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Were all these claims barred at the time of the passage of that act?

Mr. MANN. Oh, these claims had not arisen at the time of the passage of that act. No one had dreamed of claims at that time.

Mr. SISSON. What I meant is the pay, for example, of an officer who resigned his commission in the United States Army and joined the Confederacy, having money due him at that time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, this has nothing to do with that.

Mr. SISSON. Those were the claims I had in mind.

Mr. MANN. This has nothing to do with that. This does not affect the pay that was due to the officer, except in the matter of the computation of the longevity pay.

Mr. SISSON. But that would be affected by the passage of this act in 1867.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it would have been affected then when the claims were alive, before the statute of limitations run, but they could not have been paid after the statute of limitations had run, and if we should enact a law to pay them, they would be paid regardless of section 3480.

Mr. SISSON. That would be true irrespective of whether the claimant was a Confederate or Union soldier.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The question is whether this statute had barred the longevity pay in 1867.

Mr. MANN. There is no difference between this case and any other claim that the Government orders paid to an individual. Whenever the Government orders it paid, that statute is not effective.

Mr. SISSON. If the claims were not barred at the passage of this act, then this act operated as a bar?

Mr. MANN. It operated as a bar if they bring the claim before the accounting officers, but it did not operate as a bar before Congress. No one ever pretended that that section forbade Congress to provide for the payment of the claims. It applies only to the accounting officers and the officers of the Government.

Mr. SISSON. At that time I doubt whether the feeling would have permitted the passage of an act, however just the claim might be. The only question is whether or not they have been dealt with just as they would have been dealt with and as other claims have been dealt with.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely, that is all.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to make a statement a while ago that similar cases of this character had been put on in the Senate for Union soldiers.

Mr. MANN. I did not say Union soldiers. I do not think it has been confined to Union soldiers.

Mr. GARNER. Officers of the United States Army?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And that they had been universally refused by the House?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the Congress permits these claims to be paid, I agree with the gentleman that we can not well resist similar claims offered by gentlemen who have not been incapacitated by their service somewhere else.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. After the United States Supreme Court decided that this longevity pay should apply from the entrance to the Military or Naval Academies, it was then too late, because the statute of limitations had run, to make any claim prior to 1867.

Mr. MANN. I endeavored to state a while ago that it was too late to succeed in any claim where six years had elapsed. This has nothing to do with 1867.

Mr. OGLESBY. So that no Union soldier collected anything which accrued prior to that time?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. OGLESBY. Therefore the Confederate soldiers are in no worse situation than the Union soldiers?

Mr. MANN. No Union soldier has ever collected a cent that was barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But before it was barred they collected $1,000,000.

Mr. MANN. They collected the million dollars only for the six-year period where the statute of limitations did not bar them, just prior to the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? My information is, I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Ask me a question—well, go ahead.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I simply want to clear up the matter. My information is since 1907 a million dollars of claims of this character accruing to old soldiers have been paid.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is not true. There has been no money paid to any Union soldier for any service prior to 1875 on these claims.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. WEBB. Since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Watson, handed down in 1889, wherein they say the time of the service in the Military Academy at West Point is to be reckoned as a part of the time an officer served in the Army, within the meaning of the act of July 5, 1838, and should be counted in computing the longevity pay—I will ask if since that time these cadets have not been drawing this pay? What information has the gentleman on that point?

Mr. MANN. Of course the cadets do not draw longevity pay. The service at the Military and Naval Academies was counted as part of the five years in order to fix his increase of 10 per cent until a Democratic Congress—wisely, in my judgment—repealed that provision, changing it. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Then, since the——

Mr. MANN. And did it without opposition, by the way.

Mr. WEBB. Since the rendition of this opinion, however, they have been entitled to it until a Democratic Congress repealed it.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. They received longevity pay from that time until Congress repealed the law in the last Congress based upon the proposition that their service at West Point and Annapolis was service in the Army and Navy, and they also, those who could, filed claims within the six-year limitation after the decision of the Supreme Court had been rendered, and if they had legal claims against the Government they were paid.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit this question, as the gentleman seems to be remarkably familiar with the facts of the case: Up to the time the Supreme Court rendered the opinion in the Morton case in 1884, which is in line with the case I have referred to, had any officer ever applied for longevity pay based upon service at the Military Academy?

Mr. MANN. Of course some filed or there never would have been a case in the Supreme Court.

Mr. WEBB. Of course Mr. Morton did; but was there any general attempt?

Mr. MANN. There was not, and it never was even dreamed of, except some shrewd attorney got it up, and they probably worked the Supreme Court through social influence.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not a claim agent institute that proceeding and did he not claim he had done a great thing in originating it?

Mr. MANN. Now, for instance, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] seemed to believe—and I have no doubt of his good faith in the matter—that the only claims were Confederate soldiers who had been discriminated against. Here is a man who entered the Military Academy June 11, 1838, served continuously from that date until the date of his death, in September, 1847. This is a finding of the Court of Claims, and I have quite a large number of them. He received all the pay he thought he was entitled to. He knew what the law was; he received all the pay that Congress appropriated for him; he received all the pay that the Government thought he was entitled to. The question had never been raised. The Army thought it was very lucky, indeed, to have secured from Congress a law providing for a 10 per cent increase in pay every five years from entrance into the Army and the Navy and not from the entrance in the academy, and yet this man, dead since 1847, has a claim pending amounting to $590.80. Of course, you would have supposed his longevity pay would have been lost entirely, because there is only 20 years to raise the 40 per cent between the time he went in the academy in 1838. I do not know how they figure it out, but they do. I have a large number of these findings here, not of Confederate soldiers but of Union and Confederate soldiers, of men who died years before the war commenced, of men who entered the service long after the war ceased—all of them have claims. Every officer who was in either the Army or Navy during the last century, who was in the Military or Naval Academy, had one of these claims. It is inevitable that they should have. They supposed they were getting the pay to which they were entitled. We supposed they were getting the pay to which they were entitled, and after they have died and passed away some claim agent worked up the claim for the estate. My friend from Alabama said, Pay these claims and let these poor—I will not say "poor"—but let these old soldiers have this money in their declining years. Well, I hold in my hand the omnibus claims bill of the last Congress, where there were a large number of these claims specifically inserted. Virginia Forse, administratrix; Flora A. Janes, administratrix; James M. Seawell, administrator; Julia E. Wilcox, administratrix; Edgar L. Swaine, administrator; Albert B. Greene, administrator; Lizzie F. Remington, administratrix; Catherine Du B. Beale, administratrix. That does not sound much like taking care of old soldiers in their declining years, and I have read them as they come. There are a great number of these claims specifically provided for in the omnibus section of the bill as a Senate amendment. Then the bill originally contained a general provision authorizing these claims for all officers in the Army.

Of course, if we allow them for the Army we must allow them for the Navy. When that bill came over to the House with the Senate amendments, attention was called to these claims. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who had charge of the omnibus claims bill, stated on the floor of the House that they never would be agreed to; that there was absolutely no justice in them. Now, I know what the social influence is. Old Gen. Mackenzie, one of the finest men I ever met, used to be Chief of Engineers, and has one of these claims. Old Gen. Marshall, one of the finest men I ever met, used to be Chief of Engineers, and has one of these claims. All of these old officers on the retired list living in Washington, and there are a number of them, who were in Annapolis or West Point, have these claims. I have met the social touch in connection with these claims myself, but not until I knew more about them than some of the gentlemen who have succumbed to the social influence. Now, as to the pending amendment, there can be no justification for it. That only appropriates money to pay those portions of the claims where the men had been in the Union Army or the Army of the United States, and resigned and went into the Confederate Army, without paying the claims of those who remained in the United States Army. The claims of the men who remained in the United States Army are still unpaid. I am not in favor of paying them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. OGLESBY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. I think I understand the gentleman, but I would like to put this question to him: If the Graham bill, which passed in July of this year, had been passed in 1884, at the time the Supreme Court rendered that decision, were there then any men who had gone into the Confederate Army who could have filed a claim? Were there any of those men who had a claim that had arisen within six years prior to that date?

Mr. MANN. There were not. If section 3480 had never been passed at all, not one of these claims could have been paid except by direct legislation or appropriation by Congress. So that section of the statute made no difference. It never affected our right to legislate or appropriate. That statute did not affect a thing. Some wise, bright claim agent got up the idea of repealing that statute, knowing it did not affect anything, but in order to work the sympathetic, patriotic racket on Congress. I think the statute ought to have been repealed. I do not think it has any place on the statute books now. But it has nothing to do, in fact, with these claims.

Now, we have always resisted these claims in the House of Representatives. No one knows how much they amount to. It is proposed here to appropriate $175,000 only to take care of the claims of the United States Army officers who resigned to go into the Confederate service. These claims cover a period from 1813, the date of entering the service, as I have just illustrated, down to the time of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. And if it takes $175,000 to take care of all those officers who resigned from the United States Army to go into the Confederate Army, who can tell how much it will take to pay the claims of all of the officers who have been in the Army during all of these years? And, then, who can tell how much more it will take to pay similar claims of the officers of the Navy? We can not pay one of these claims without paying all of them. We have no right to discriminate. I would not discriminate against a Confederate officer, and I do not believe we ought to discriminate in his favor. The claim agents, if they can get one of these claims paid, know very well that justice and equity will require us to pay all of them. We might as well pay the claims of men whose property was destroyed by the flood. There never was any justice in the claims, and we never supposed they were to be paid. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois is undoubtedly one of the most diligent men in this House in attending to his business, and he is usually accurate in the information which he furnishes to the House; but he has evidently made a very great mistake in presenting the facts to the House in reference to this question.

Now, the gentleman would lead you to believe from what he states that Congress has paid no claims of this kind to Union soldiers. As a matter of fact, since 1907 it has paid about $1,000,000 worth of them. I hold in my hand just one bill, because I have not had a chance to get them all—a deficiency bill, approved March 4, 1913—and on page 26 of that bill, under "Claims allowed by the Auditor of the War Department for pay, etc., of the Army," there is allowed $23,354.02. And this was for longevity pay for northern officers since 1838. So the gentleman is in absolute error in his statement to the House that the officers of the northern army have not been paid these claims heretofore. I do not mean to say that there are not some pending now. That may be true, but that some of them have been paid is unquestionably a fact. That they have amounted in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 is absolutely a fact. Now, I do not contend for one minute that you should pay these officers who served in the Union Army and resigned and went to the Confederate Army, and not pay other officers in the Union Army in a like manner, but you have been paying them, and are paying them, and last year's deficiency bill carried an item to pay some of these claims.

Now, when this repeal of section 3480 was passed here within the last month, what was the purpose for which it was repealed? It was not repealed to occupy an idle hour or to amuse Congress. It was repealed for the specific purpose, because the report said so, to give these very officers an opportunity to file these claims. No statute of limitations has debarred these officers. There is no laches on their part. They were barred by a statute that prohibited an officer who had been in the Union Army and entered the Confederate service from bringing a claim against the United States Government. There was no laches on their part, because they never had an opportunity to act until within the last 30 days. And if you want to repudiate your action of a month ago, if you want to say that these claims shall not be considered, that is another question. But to repudiate these claims on the basis that the officers in the Union Army have not been paid their longevity pay, where they filed their claims before the statute of limitations ran against them, is wrong, and that there have not been claims paid by this Congress to officers who did let the statute of limitations run against them is equally unjustified by the facts.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Under what authority would the auditor have a right to audit a claim where the statute of limitations had run against it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He had the authority of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Where is the authority?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know that, but I refer the gentleman to a claim that is in a bill, where we did pay it.

Mr. MANN. That could only refer to audited claims.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman read something that was not in the bill. The statute expressly prohibits the certification of an audited claim for longevity pay except six years prior to the decision of the Supreme Court, and I have sent for the statute. These men could not have obtained any favors. It was a decision made in 1884.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama was misled by some one. There is no such thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have the proposition here in my hand, in the act I have referred to: "For pay, and so forth, in the Army," of claims to the extent of over $23,000 for longevity pay.

Mr. MANN. How does it read?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. "Claims allowed by the Auditor for the War Department for pay, and so forth, of the Army, $23,354.02."

Mr. MANN. Claims allowed for pay of the Army. That has nothing to do with these old longevity claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Those claims, I am informed, were for this very longevity pay.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been misinformed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so. I have the information from a source that I am satisfied with; and I know, further than that, that the officers in the Union Army, where there was no statute, were paid these longevity claims. Now, how can you, in any justice, say that laches or the statute of limitations applies, if you are going to pass a bill and wipe out the barrier that existed against those men? They had no chance to present their claims. How can you say laches or the statute of limitations ran against these men when you but yesterday opened the door to them to make their claim?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman give me a few minutes more while he is looking up that reference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the statute that was passed a few days ago, with which the Members of the House are familiar, repealed all of that portion of section 3480 which affected the right of an officer of the United States Army who resigned his commmission in the Army and joined the Confederacy. The language repealed by that statute is this:

SEC. 3480. It shall be unlawful for any officer to pay any account, claim, or demand against the United States which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who during such rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression; and no pardon heretofore granted, or hereafter to be granted, shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand until this section is modified or repealed.

Now, that statute was passed in 1867 for the purpose of preventing any Confederate officer, who was previously a Union officer, getting any pay which the Government of the United States owed him at the time of the beginning of the War between the States, which he had the right to prior to the 13th of April, 1861. The statute which was passed here the other day was passed for the purpose of enabling these officers to get that longevity pay which was due them at that time, together with pay and allowance they resigned, which they would have gotten if they had remained in the Union Army, because, as was argued on the floor here—which argument prompted the Members of this House in voting for the repeal and prompted the Members of the Senate—the accounting officers of the Government were not permitted to compute this pay and could not pay this money was because of the existence of that old statute of 1867, section 3480, which was specifically repealed, and repealed for that purpose, and that purpose only. That is the object of that, and the item in this bill is for the purpose of enabling the officers of the Government to make the computation as to what was due these officers under the law at that time, just as if they had remained Union officers, and the appropriation does not do more than that. That is all that it does do, and in the passage of this appropriation in this bill it does not enable these people to do more than that. If the gentleman will get the appropriation act——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. If those officers were Union officers now, could they recover their claims now?

Mr. SISSON. Union officers?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Well, it is possible that the Union officer who, having no such statute barring him as the statute in section 3480, would be barred by the statute of limitations; but, as was stated the other day in the discussion of this repealing act, these men could not assert their claims. The accounting officers had no right to pay the claims. No officer in the Government could pay them. But every Union officer got his pay as it became due, without an exception.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that most of these claims commenced long before the Civil War. I read one awhile ago of one officer.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that is bound to be true as it affects a Confederate officer. As the gentleman says, it must have happened before April 13, 1861, unless the officer reenlisted in the Union Army after the Civil War, as, for example, in the Spanish-American War, and should have become an officer under the statute.

Mr. MANN. The statute of limitations would run if that had not been in the law at all.

Mr. SISSON. The statute of limitations would have run against these men if the doors had been open to them.

Mr. MANN. They were open before the war. They had the theoretical claim, but did not know it.

Mr. SISSON. The point in the whole matter is that those men who entered the Confederate service should be dealt with just as the Union officer. They were officers of the Army of the United States, and should have gotten what was due them when they resigned. They rendered the service to the Government up until they resigned. They should be put identically on the same plane. To do this they should be paid what was due them.

Now, I will state frankly to the gentleman that it is not my purpose or my aim or object to open up any floodgate, but irrespective of the question of whether or not it is a Union officer who went into the Confederate service, the only question in my mind is to have these men at this time, when we are all absolutely united, treated exactly like the others, and I do not believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would have any other treatment accorded to those people. As I gathered from what he said, that is the point he made in his speech—he wanted them to be dealt with alike. To do this, pay them what was due them on the date of their resignation.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman knows that no Union officer has ever been able to receive one single cent for any time prior to April 13, 1861, and the claims of all these Confederate officers must have been prior to that time.

Mr. SISSON. That is what I am trying to make clear. They received it regularly under the law. It was paid as it became due. The statute of 1867 prevented any computation of any service rendered by a man who afterwards went into the Confederate service.

Mr. MANN. But the Union soldier at the same time could not secure any claim, because the statute of limitations debarred him. They were all before 1861.

Mr. SISSON. But they were all paid and could have no claim. These Confederate officers were not paid anything. The statute of limitations was suspended during the hostilities, during the actual war. But that is far from the point involved here. We simply say, pay these officers what was due them when they resigned. All Union officers, of course, got theirs. It was paid under the law as it fell due. If the statute ran against him after hostilities ceased, it would be laches on his part, for which he would be responsible; but if the statute stands in the way of a Union officer who afterwards joined the Confederacy, laches could not stand against him because of the statute which forbids the pay of what the Government owes him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MANN. But the Union soldier, having had a chance to make a claim——

Mr. SISSON. He would be able to press that now.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. SISSON. I would be willing to do that, and the statute does exactly that. It treats the Union officer and is compelled to treat the Union officer who has not received his pay under this statute just as it would treat the officer under the Confederacy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this amendment provides for the payment of longevity claims of officers of the United States Army who left the United States Army and entered the Confederate service. No officer of the United States Army has received any allowance for longevity claims of this character during the period covered by this amendment. The only longevity claims of this character that have been paid are those for the six years prior to the decision of the United States Supreme Court. The adoption of this amendment means that men who were in the United States Army and who resigned from it to enter the Confederate Army are to be allowed these longevity claims, while no provision is made for men who were in the United States Army and remained in the Army and fought on the Union side.

This is the most ingenious amendment ever devised and presented to the House. Members of the House are not responsible for it; but the bright minds who devised it know that if this Congress provides that officers of the United States Army who resigned from that Army and went into the Confederate Army are paid these longevity claims an irresistible demand will arise that will open the Treasury to the millions of claims of the men who remained loyal to the Union and who were in the Army after the war and whose claims have been barred.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is wholly mistaken about the appropriations that have been made. I have in my hand House Document No. 1372, Sixty-second Congress, third session, which is the schedule of claims allowed by accounting officers, transmitted to Congress under date of February 10, 1913, and for which, under the head of audited claims, the deficiency bill carried $23,354.02 for pay of officers, and so forth, of the Regular Army. The gentleman from Alabama stated that it included claims dated as far back as 1838, and in that he is mistaken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But that is what the record discloses, from which I got this information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe the gentleman is mistaken, and I believe I can demonstrate it. The fiscal year in which the expenditure occurred is stated in this document opposite the names of the claimants, together with the amount of the claims. Every single expenditure in that schedule, covering three pages, was incurred in the fiscal year 1910 and in prior years. They could not go back to a period antedating the six years prior to the decision of the United States Supreme Court, because they were claims of men in the Army in 1910, and none of them served before the war. For instance, in the general deficiency act in 1912 the sum of $220,000 was appropriated for certified claims. Questions like this continually arise: An officer is promoted and his commission issued. A controversy arises as to the date from which his pay should commence in his new grade. Controversies arise as to allowances to which he is entitled, when assigned on different duties. Such matters go to the auditor, are adjusted and are certified for inclusion in the deficiency bill. I am informed by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who is very accurate in his knowledge and who has a vast fund of information in reference to these matters, that a statute prohibits the auditor certifying any claims for longevity for any period prior to six years before the United States Supreme Court decision. Suppose section 3480 of the Revised Statutes had been repealed when the Supreme Court rendered its decision, or suppose that provision of the Revised Statutes had never been enacted. Not a single one of the claims proposed to be paid in this amendment could now be paid or could have been paid at any other time. This amendment lifts the men who went into the Confederate service into a preferred class and permits them to be paid these longevity claims, for which no other man who served in the Army can receive pay or ever has received pay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The statute of limitations can run against no man until the opportunity for the claim accrues. As these men were barred by reason of this statute, section 3480, the door was never open for them to make the claim until last month.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not barred to these men. They could have asserted a claim for this longevity pay at any time prior to their resignation from the Army, but nobody ever thought of making such claim; and the gentleman does not intend to contend that because of that statute a man who had been in the Confederate service should be given the right to file a claim which the man who remained in the Union Army was deprived of filing, except for the period of six years prior to 1884.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but I do claim this: That when Congress passed this act last month repealing section 3480 it did so with the express purpose of authorizing the payment of these claims. It is so stated in the report. It was argued on the floor. The amount of the claims was stated to the House, and every Member of this House who voted to repeal that statute knew that it opened the door for $165,000 worth of claims to these soldiers; and with that knowledge before them, the House and the Senate enacted it into law; and I say that was the will of the House, the intention of Congress, and it seems to me that for the Committee on Appropriations to come here now and ask the House to repudiate its action is to put us in the attitude of merely maching up the hill and then marching down again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was in the House that day and I heard the very eloquent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and I never heard a suggestion, and I never imagined for a moment, and nobody else in this House imagined, that that was what Congress was doing in the passage of that act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is stated in the report. I read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care about the reports, because I do not read them very often. I do not have the chance. But nobody ever suspected that Congress was proposing to open the door to claims of men who left the Regular Army to go into the Confederate service, and at the same time denying the opportunity for claims for the same service for the same period to be presented by men in the Regular Army who remained loyal to the Union. I think for anybody to assert now that Congress intended that is to make an assertion that can not be justified.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was believed, Mr. Speaker, was that we were placing the men who had left the Army and gone into the Confederate service on an equal footing with men who remained loyal to the Union. But this amendment does not propose such action. We are giving them something that the men who remained loyal have not got and can not get. This House never intended and never knew what was being accomplished by that act. I would go as far as anyone to wipe out whatever lingering or smoldering animosities there may be arising out of that terrible conflict which divided this country from 1861 to 1865—and what I say is not for the purpose of arousing any feeling—but I would not have Congress do an act which, in effect, puts a premium upon the action of the men who left the service of their country to take arms in the Confederate service, and that is what is done in this amendment.

If Congress wishes to enact a law so that every man who was in the Regular Army shall be able to present a claim for longevity service and be paid for it, so far as I am concerned I am willing to meet others and to let these men who did go into the Confederate service be placed on an equal footing with the men who remained in the Army or who did not go into the Confederate service. I would be willing to blot out and remove the effect of any action by which these men went into the Confederate service, because I have always believed that the men who took that side of the controversy were sincerely actuated by lofty and patriotic motives. The awful conflict, which resulted finally in the preservation of the Union, has long passed; it is the duty of everyone to cooperate as much as possible to obliterate the causes of ill feeling that so long remained and to do everything possible to restore the common brotherhood of this country. But to say that Congress intended, in order to meet the condition that existed and to bring about a better feeling, to enact a law which gave the men who went into the Confederate service an advantage and preference, and an opportunity to present a claim to which Congress has persistently refused to the men who remained in the Army and were loyal to the Union, is going far beyond what anyone can justify.

I believe that those who advocate this amendment do so in the honest belief that it puts the men who went into the Confederate service on a footing with those who remained in the Army and engaged on the Union side, but it does not do so. It does much more. There is no record that I have been able to find where anyone has been paid longevity pay for the period covered by this amendment. If this amendment be adopted, there can be no excuse, there can be no defense to the claims presented by every man who was in the Army and remained in it on the Union side.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. It strikes me that under the decision of the Supreme Court both Confederate claims due these officers, as well as claims of the Federal officers, who were at West Point are entitled to the pay. Can the gentleman give any idea as to how much the amount would be due the Federal officers and widows who served at West Point during the same period as these in the Confederate service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no idea, but I think it runs up into the millions. The gentleman will remember that this is merely for those men who went into the Confederate service.

Mr. WEBB. And there are 173 of those, I believe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it would take in the men in the Regular Army.

Mr. WEBB. They did not all serve at West Point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would include all the men in the Regular Army who were graduates of West Point.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The statement was made repeatedly that a million dollars has been paid, and the only men or officers paid were those that were not barred by the six years. The amount that has been paid accrued in six years, whereas the men who have not been paid the amount accrued between the years 1838 and 1878.

Mr. WEBB. That did not take into consideration the longevity pay based on service in the Military Academy?

Mr. MANN. Both academies.

Mr. WEBB. That was not based solely on the longevity that accrued at the academy.

Mr. MANN. That was the statement of the gentleman from Alabama, that a million dollars had been paid on these claims, and there was no claim paid except where the claim had accrued within six years.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For what?

Mr. SISSON. For a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has given the other side of this proposition 30 minutes and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama and 5 minutes to myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. I gave the gentleman from Alabama all the time he desired, and so stated at the beginning.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Alabama only occupied 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. He occupied nearly 15 minutes. I gave the gentleman from Misssisippi all the time he asked for.

Mr. SISSON. You only gave me five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was all the gentleman asked for.

Mr. SISSON. I did not ask for more because the time was limited. But the question I want to ask is, Will the gentleman state positively that every officer has not received his longevity pay from 1861 to the present time? Is it not true that in appropriation bills almost every year since the Supreme Court delivered its opinion the Union officers have been receiving pay? I ask for information, for I have not had time to look it up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state what I understand to be the fact——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may continue for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the claims of no officer have been paid for a period antedating six years prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in 1884, if that be the correct date. These certified claims are not for periods prior to that date. I do say, and I am as absolutely certain as I can be, that claims of this character for the period of service covered by the service of the men to be affected by this amendment have not been paid to anybody. This gives to those who served in the Confederate Army payment of claims that has been denied to men who served in the Union Army.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Supreme Court decision that brought about this question was rendered in 1884. Since that time there have been no claims for officers in the Union Army, because it was added into their pay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of men who were in the service, yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am informed—I have not looked it up, but I have received the information from a gentleman who has and in whom I have the utmost confidence—that there has been in the neighborhood of a million dollars of these claims paid. They must have been claims that originated before 1880.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Claims that originated within six years prior to the decision of the Supreme Court. If the statute repealed the other day had never been enacted, when the Supreme Court rendered its decision about this longevity pay none of the men affected by the Senate amendment could have asserted a claim, because they were not in a position to do it. They had been out of the service for a period more than six years back. The claims were barred by the statute of limitations, the same as the claims of Union officers.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Unless claims of this character are paid, is there any field for the operation of the law we passed just a few days ago?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. BURNETT. Was it not merely nugatory?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether there be any field for it or not; but I have no hesitation in saying that in voting for the law passed the other day I had no intention, and I do not propose because I voted for that bill to be put in the position of voting to pay the claims of these men who went into the Confederate service, when Congress has decided it will not pay similar claims for men who remained in the Union service.

Mr. Speaker, I ask a division of the question, that the vote be taken first on the question of receding from the disagreement of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment 158.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment 158.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 24, noes 70.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 154, answered "present" 1, not voting 210, as follows:

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the House asking for a conference on the sundry civil bill with the Senate be vacated and that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the order of the House to ask for a conference with the Senate be vacated and the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on the amendments to the sundry civil bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on a personal matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks permission to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interfere with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I object to anything except the regular order at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. I will not do this if the gentleman will give me 10 minutes, although I think the question of personal privilege will be sustained.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if it is a matter that is personal to the gentleman, of course I will not object. I did not so understand.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, it is a personal matter, and I so stated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding for 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, sometimes I wonder whether a man who utters a lie is more to be complained against than a man who builds upon a lie. The man who stabs in the dark strikes a blow that can not be repelled; and the man who writes an anonymous letter can not be found; so that the victim of a man who thus strikes or who writes anonymously is helpless unless he can find the man who lies about him. The man who builds upon a lie can not always be found and the effect of the lie passing from one to another may shatter a reputation. Therefore I am inclined to believe that the man who builds upon a lie is worse, perhaps, than he who gives the lie direct. As to the anonymous letter writer we may all have contempt for him because all of us, doubtless, have been his victims. He who thus writes anonymously writes in the spirit of cowardice because he leaves no trace, and no utterance of the truth or reply to the insinuations made may catch up to him. Hence the poisoned pen is one of the most vicious of all the offenses in the catalogue of crimes. It shatters character.

I would regret to think that there was a man in the House of Representatives who would lie, and I would regret sincerely to think that there was one in the House who would build upon a lie, or that there was one who would sanction an anonymous letter that would tend to destroy a reputation of a colleague. I do not impute motives of this kind to any Member of this House, but I do say that a practice has arisen here to which the public attention ought to be drawn, involving an abuse of the privilege of leave to print, the privilege which abused, might enable a Member to unjustly criticize or condemn a colleague without the latter having an opportunity, face to face, to meet the accusation.

I shall not put myself in the position of accusing anyone of having dealt so unfairly with me as these remarks might indicate I have it in mind to do toward any Member of the House. I am speaking of a practice that has arisen and of the abuse of it which the House by sufferance has tolerated. There ought to be a closer inspection of the leave to print and of the right of a Member, so inclined, to print that which in all good conscience and in honor should be unprintable in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There ought to be that honor, at least, among Members of the House that is attributed to a worse class of our citizens—the honor of being fair with one another. If I can not trust my brother, a Member of this House, to be fair with me when by my silence I give him the leave to print, which I could prevent by offering an objection, then I am in a sorry plight, for I would regret to think there was any Member of this House who could not be trusted to do the right thing in courtesy by his colleagues, no matter to what party he belonged.

I make these observations because I believe they are important and that they may help to lead to a correction of the abuse to which I have referred.

Now, sometimes some of us get spectacular in this House and do those things which are calculated to attract attention in the newspapers. This may account in part for the abuse of privilege. The active working men on this floor sometimes go unnoticed for months because of the brilliant dashes of those who take chances to attract popular attention. There are those, perchance, who get to the newspapers quicker than the loyal worker upon the floor, and possibly there are those who work that practice to the limit, especially in preelection times. Now, I am not accusing anybody in particular in this respect, for I may be as amenable as others, but I am stating a fact of which all men may take notice.

In the RECORD of this morning, July 22, on page 12512, are the remarks of Mr. BRYAN, of Washington, printed under leave granted to him to print; that is to say, the presumption is that he obtained the leave of this House by unanimous consent to print. I will leave it to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] to say whether he obtained that unanimous consent or not. I presume he did. But these remarks to which I make reference were not uttered upon the floor of this House. If they had been, those to whom they apply would have had the opportunity to answer them, and to answer them in a manly way. It would have made no difference how forceful nor how pointed they were, if they were within the parliamentary limit they could have been answered; but it would have been fair only to utter them in the presence of those against whom they were directed.

I have nothing to say in regard to these extended remarks of the gentleman from Washington, not uttered upon the floor of the House, as they apply to my colleagues. I desire to say in regard to these remarks, not delivered upon the floor of the House nor uttered in open debate, where I could hear them, but shoved in under cover of darkness, as it were, under leave to print; pushed in so that I had no notice or opportunity to reply, and in a manner which I believe to be objectionable; that while I believe him guilty of a parliamentary offense, I am willing to pardon him on the ground of youth and inexperience.

Mr. BRYAN, if correctly quoted in the RECORD of this morning, on page 12512, said:

> The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], palms up, says, "Pisness is pisness. This can give time, but we need the interest." Yet he nearly talked himself into utter exhaustion to try to force through here a scheme to get the Government to buy a lot of waste lands in Philadelphia, near a powder plant, which was worthless almost and was not needed, and yet to cost a very large sum. He takes relays with other gentlemen here in pleading for "protection for the infant industries of Pennsylvania." He wants the Government to take from the people a sum of money to swell the profits of every trust-owned factory in his State—the infant industry known as the Steel Trust, the textile mills, and the shipping plants. He did not mind helping the ships with free tolls, but a farmer on the reclaimed arid plains of the West, making an American home, creating wealth, bringing up citizens who will fight for the flag when called, are not worth 3 cents. "Pisness is pisness."

And further along he adds:

> "U. S." does not stand for "Uncle Shylock."

Now, of course, that may seem amusing to some of you and to a certain extent it is amusing to me, because of the utter variance from the truth of the statement therein made. The inference is, so far as I am concerned personally, that I represent certain interests in this House unfair to the farmers of the land, for whom the gentleman from Washington attempts to speak. That is a totally unwarranted statement.

I have on previous occasions challenged anyone who wanted to question my record in that respect, and I do not hesitate to challenge them now. I am as free to vote with honor upon any public question that arises here as any man in this House, as free from the domination of corporation bosses as I am of labor bosses, or political bosses, or any other bosses. I know the people of my district, and I vote and labor here as I believe befits their welfare, and I labor here for that larger interest of the United States which, I believe, becomes me as a representative of all the people without regard to classes.

But, so far as my own feelings in this matter are concerned, I do not worry, because I am responsible to the people who send me here. I want to hear my course criticized, but in the open and not in the dark. I do not want to have it appear in the State of Washington under flaming headlines in the newspapers, and under the franking privilege when these speeches are sent out, that these violent assaults upon "the agents of evil" are made upon the floor of the House, when they are slipped into the RECORD under the cover of darkness.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Let us dispense with the personal side of it, Mr. Speaker, and take up that question which I regard as more serious—the slipping into the RECORD of those things not uttered upon the floor and that appear to an unsuspecting constituency at home as having been uttered here in fiery debate. The gentleman from Washington, I said, was guilty of this offense, and I charge him now with having violated the rules of courtesy, if not the parliamentary rules of the House, when he put quotation marks upon an expression which he attributed to me for the purpose of his argument and to which I never gave utterance. I not only object to his reflecting upon an honorable race of men and women, but to his putting me in the position of making a mockery of them. [Applause.]

If he has no respect for the great Jewish race in the United States and proposes to make fun of them in the public RECORD, he can not do it by putting the language in my mouth and using quotation marks upon remarks which he attributes to me and which I never used. "Pisness is pisness," and "palms up," says the gentleman from Washington, attributing those remarks to me, and putting the quotation marks upon them as if I had spoken them. Herein was his principal fault.

The gentleman from Washington manufactured this speech of his out of whole cloth. He manufactured this quotation from me out of the whole cloth, and by doing it gave offense to millions of worthy citizens of the land for whom apparently he has contempt and for whom I have always entertained the highest respect.

I believe, in the course of time, that this sort of abuse of the unanimous-consent privilege to extend remarks in the CON-

GRESSIONAL RECORD will be corrected. But I am glad of this opportunity to say, so long as I am placed in the limelight by reason of the thrust after dark of the gentleman from Washington, that those gentlemen in this House who hold themselves holier than others who are performing their duty honestly and conscientiously may some day be pointed out for the demagogues they are. [Applause.] I believe that the poor people of this land, the poor farmers in the district that the gentleman himself represents, the farmers upon this arid and semi-arid soil, for whom the Government of the United States is spending $7,500 per farm, which is not granted to any other farmer in the United States, would rather have the truth as it comes from "the gentleman from Pennsylvania" than they would to have the misstatements as they come from "the gentleman from Washington."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said several things just a moment ago——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether a reply to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] wants an opportunity to reply, I suggest that he ask for 10 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I agree to the suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that my time be limited to 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the first thing that I want to refer to—a thing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has thrust at me—is that he has accused me of impugning or criticizing a race of people. I was not talking about any race of people. I was talking about the gentleman from Pennsylvania, J. HAMPTON MOORE. I did not say anything about the Jews of this country. I respect that race, and think he is the one who has insulted them and hurled an insult in their face.

Where is there anything about the Jewish race in what I said? Why should that gentleman rise here and accuse me, or suggest that the Jewish race of this country is referred to in that little suggestion that I made there about some one being rather parsimonious about money? The Jews of my district are not that kind of people. They may be in Philadelphia, if the gentleman looks at it in that way, but the Jews of my State are a progressive race of people. They are progressive, and they are found on the newspapers, they are found in the public marts and in the places of trade, and they are always standing for things that are uplifting and decent. I do not know how they are in Philadelphia; but if there is an insult to the Jews of this country, it is the Jews of Philadelphia, those that the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows, that have been insulted, and not the Jews that I know, because I do not know that kind of people in my district.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as the unanimous consent was concerned, I obtained unanimous consent. I do not know why that line was dropped out of the RECORD, but unanimous consent ought to have been lodged in the RECORD. I did request that my remarks be inserted and extended, and it ought to have appeared right after the unanimous consent was asked.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in so far as he concludes that I intended by anything that I said to impugn the honor or integrity of the gentleman or his work on this floor, is entirely mistaken, and he has made an assumption that is not warranted by anything that I thought, and I do not believe by anything that I said. I respect the gentleman, and I want him to know, and I want this House to know, that I respect him as an honorable Member of this House.

The worst thing that I know of his doing is to get up here and openly and publicly insult a race that is represented in all the great cities of this country by men who are standing for something and doing something. I think that is the disgrace of this session.

So far as the gentleman's injustice goes, in coming here and pleading, as I said he did, times without number for all kinds of laws that will take away from the people of the West and from the people of the South and from the purchasers and consumers of this country their hard-earned money in their pockets and turn it over to the mills and the factories in his State, I think it is warranted. I think it is just to criticize that economic position of the gentleman; that persistent claim that he has always made, that we of the country elsewhere owe all our substance to his particular corporations, his Steel Trust, his textile interests, and other interests; so that what I had there in mind, what I suggested there, I believe, is based on the real truth, and they are real facts, as everyone in this House may know.

I want to repeat what I said at the start, that any statement that I have attempted, or that I had in my mind any desire to impugn the honorable motives of the gentleman is false. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania first started out, he used the word "lie," and I got up and walked around and sat in front of him, determined that if he applied that to me, I was going to make the best effort of my life to put him across the bench there. I was not going to let him say that; but he did not. He said he did not apply it to me; and all I want the RECORD to show is that my determined view in this matter is that I was only talking economics—what I considered just, honorable, and upright economics—and was not impugning the motives of any man. So far as the language incorporated in my extension, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] referred, he did not use that identical language or quotation in the debate.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes, to say something in behalf of the Jews.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that question in a minute.

Mr. RUCKER. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will explain to the gentleman from Washington and all other Members that when a gentleman has the floor and is saying something that some other gentleman thinks reflects on him, the proper procedure is not to undertake to get up a row with the man who has the floor, but to address the Chair and ask that his words be taken down. That is the orderly procedure. This is not a school for pugilism. [Applause.]

RESERVED LANDS AT HEADWATERS OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1784) restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and tributaries, and ask to agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to agree to the conference which has been asked for by the Senate. Without objection it is so ordered, and the Chair announces as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FERRIS, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, and Mr. LENROOT.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 16294) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments of the Senate.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the following pension bills, H. R. 16345, H. R. 15959, and H. R. 17482, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 16345. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

H. R. 15959. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

H. R. 17482. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take the three bills just reported from the Speaker's table, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. Do I understand that these are all House bills?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. They are all House bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 16579. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. John River at Fort Kent, Me.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, numbered 158.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 8630. An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii," approved August 1, 1912; and

H. R. 15320. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard section 33 of the public-buildings act of March 4, 1913, as to site at Owego, N. Y.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and pending that I would like to take the sense of the House on a request for unanimous consent that not later than 6 o'clock to-night we take a recess until 8 o'clock and indulge in general debate until 11 o'clock p. m.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think there will be ample time during the session for debate during the daytime, and I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will try another tack on the gentleman, and see if we can come in at 11 o'clock to-morrow. I will ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The motion of Mr. ADAMSON was then agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16053) amending the general dam act.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will find it convenient to consume some of his time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I wish to remark that there are no such things as property rights or property except as recognized and protected by such authority as is delegated by society, and, furthermore, that society in its own interest should never grant or protect rights that are not for the benefit of society. This axiom being accepted, our course is clear. Any other assumption leads to infinite muddlement.

In the evolution of orderly government there has come down some chaff with the wheat. Through our English antecedents there has come a belief in the supreme sanctity of land ownership, which to-day is being challenged and must be challenged in the interests of equalized opportunity. This preface may seem apart from the theme under discussion, but it has a vital relation.

The Federal Government in many cases has asserted its right to regulate the waters flowing over the public domain, but the question of the rights of riparian landowners to control the waters flowing by and over their property on navigable streams has been rendered complex and complicated by this system of private ownership of land, which, by an impudence of human speech, extends to heirs and assigns forever without control from the center of the earth to the surface.

Just as through the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution we have found means of breaking shackles that otherwise would have bound us to many misfit and superannuated traditions of the past; thus in the Chandler-Dunbar decision we have found a means whereby we may assert the right to control our navigable waters, for all purposes, in the interests of all the people through the violent assumption of benefiting navigation. Every man capable of clear analysis knows perfectly well that much of the navigation that is proposed as a means of regulating freight charges is absurd and extravagant. The Interstate Commerce Commission is empowered by a stretch of constitutional authority to regulate the railroads in their charges and their service, and in a vast number of cases it would be cheaper to furnish free railroad service than to improve river navigation. In this Chandler-Dunbar decision we find an assertion that the Federal Government is sovereign and supreme over the navigable waters of the country, whether or not abutting property, which supposedly runs to the middle of the stream, is in private ownership. Thus the Supreme Court gives us possession of untrammeled authority to regulate the generation of power on navigable streams.

Our duty is obvious and insistent. Either the Federal Government, as a corporate entity, should utilize this water power, or if it grants authority to an agent to utilize it, it should limit and control that agent. We by having the right to withhold have a corresponding duty to control. This is a matter but feebly comprehended and little understood in its full scope. We have been so prone to start at the wrong end of the argument and to consider private property as the foundation of society instead of considering society as the sole foundation and protection of private property that we do not recognize our social power or our social duty. Society demands the utilization of all natural resources in the public interest. Without the utilization of these resources we should be a pauper nation. Up to the present time we have gone on the presumption that there was too much of everything, and that the best policy for the Government to adopt is to alienate our common possessions into private hands and put them on the tax roll. Our forests have been wastefully cut, and men, under private ownership, have harvested and destroyed a crop in their short lifetimes that should have been perennial. Under the guise of private ownership they have destroyed three or four times as much timber as they or the community have used and have enjoyed. Our anthracite coal fields are all in private hands, and we must now beg of Mr. Baer and his successors and assigns "under Providence," as he contended, for the right to purchase the means of warming ourselves and of generating steam. Our vast resources of petroleum have been rounded up and cornered until the Navy can not find an adequate public supply. Our natural resource in iron-ore lands, whether in the North or in the South, has gone to make solvent an insanely overcapitalized Steel Trust. The man who desires to enter into manufacturing must now beg of the combinations that control the fuel for the necessary combustible to generate steam. The water power of the country, indestructible, perennial, must be held for public welfare or else there can be nothing ahead of us in times to come but a revolution that will surely demand an abrogation of the special privileges that we have so recklessly conferred.

It is not enough that our assets should be utilized, for there is no comfort in aggregate figures of national wealth; there must be an equalized distribution of benefits. We must never forget that the time will certainly come when our people through corporate entities, whether Federal, State, or municipal, will take over and operate this water power in the interests of the entire public.

Now as to this question of agency. If we, the people of the United States, choose to employ agents to do for us what we can do for ourselves, and what we have splendidly done for ourselves in the case of the Panama Canal, we must first of all see to it that our agents are fairly treated. They must be protected against unnecessary risk. They must be permitted to make reasonable combinations, for there is no such thing as practicable competition in public utilities, and next we must see to it that they are controlled in the public interest. Wherever the element of risk is large, whether from uncertain earnings or possible competition, we must admit a large element of profit. Wherever we exact unreasonable terms we must expect to pay unreasonable charges. But ever and always we must realize the necessity of leaving those who follow us a lawful opportunity to resume the powers that we, in our short lives and possibly in our short-sighted policy, have delegated to others.

The gentleman from Alabama set forth an obvious truth when he contended that a public utility of such a nature as water power is inherently a monopoly and that competition in providing this facility means duplication and waste. As to this view, he can have no contention with anyone who believes in conservation. All the more reason, then, for full power of control and regulation. But the gentleman from Alabama overlooked the obvious fallacy embodied in an argument apparently favoring those great aggregations of capital that control water power in widely scattered sections of the country. We certainly need physical union to brace and strengthen the individual plant and supply. Adjoining plants may well be linked together, so as to render certain a continuity of service in the event of a breakdown in any plant. This physical fact has nothing whatever to do with that form of monopoly evidenced by the holding of stocks and bonds. The two sorts of monopoly are absolutely distinct and bear no relation whatever to each other. One recognizes physical and economic necessity, the other a stock-jobbing opportunity.

The bill as originally proposed is an utter absurdity. Its genesis is hidden in doubt. Somehow I feel as if the name of my genial friend from Georgia were put on as an afterthought, just as people put a sticker on a ballot to help an overlooked candidate. To any man who served on the Public Lands Committee of the House, and who heard the arguments of the water-power people and listened to their requests for amendments to the bill proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, this bill is a singular echo of their desires and a nullification of all we strove to attain. As originally drafted it canceled all our work. It is not at all like the bill proposed by the Secretary of War, nor does it in any way recognize the theories he propounded in his letter to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, both of which documents will be found in the hearings on the bill held before that committee.

It has been charged that we, who have been opposing some of the features of the bill, represent a jealous attitude as between two committees; that the jurisdictions over the public lands and over navigable waterways were distinct, and that we were going out of our preserves. As a matter of fact, the bill as originally drafted absolutely negatived any control by the Secretaries of Agriculture and the Interior over the waters in the public domain that were in any way tributary to any portion of any stream that was navigable. But it was not on this account that we have entered our objection. We who believe in the utilization of the common property of all the people for the benefit of all the people are not especially worried over questions of jurisdiction. It makes no difference to us whether the water power of the country rests in the hands of the Department of the Interior, the Department of War, or the Department of Agriculture, only provided that that jurisdiction is so enforced as to result in proper utilization, proper development, good service, and reasonable prices. The Government engineers have been given mandate to report on water power. This they have failed to do. Dams have been built on water under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, apparently without his consent. The War Department must wake up to its responsibilities. Some day there must of necessity be a strong Federal utilities commission to assemble control of national assets and to exercise the discretion called for by varying conditions. It is for such control that we have so insistently fought the original bill, and have insisted upon amendments. The amendments suggested up to date grant to the Department of the Interior jurisdiction over lands on the public domain. Furthermore, they, in an uncertain and halting way, destroy the provisions of the original bill which go to make the tenure of rights under the Secretary of War perpetual, and cut them down to the limitation of 50 years after the completion of the dam.

But the same blind language stands, compelling purchase of everything remotely connected with the dam before we can resume our ownership of our leased property. We are compelled to pay for the last mat or advertising space in the last street car before we can come into our own. The bill also provides for regulation in the public interest by the Secretary of War when the States have not been granted by legislation adequate authority to control the service in the public interest. But there are some serious lapses still to be cured. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his long address on the subject, spoke of the utilization of electrical power for the production of chemicals needed in agriculture. He spoke feelingly of the export duty on Chilean nitrates, amounting to upward of $11 a ton, which has largely supported the Government of Chile. Now, if this water power be utilized for the production of an electric energy that may be required by many separate individuals or by municipal or other corporations, it would come under the jurisdiction of the State commissions. But we are asked and have been asked to practically donate our greatest asset without limitation or control, if it be used for private manufacturing.

The gentleman from Alabama is hostile to the proposition of raising Federal revenue in consideration of granting our rights to water-power sites or to water power.

Now, first of all, why should not the Federal Government receive compensation for water power granted, where the Federal Government has the undoubted right to grant or to withhold? The answer will be made that such compensation would at once be taken out of the consumer. This sounds entirely plausible until we stop to analyze the situation. Let us suppose a municipal community that needs 100,000 horsepower to operate public lighting, street railways, and privately owned plants. Let us suppose that 25,000 horsepower may be furnished under water-power grant by the Federal Government. Let us suppose that this water power may be furnished at a cost of less than $20 per horsepower per year from water power, whereas coal will cost $40 per horsepower. Now, who is to receive the benefit of the cheapened power? It would be unfair to discriminate between those who, by the use of one natural resource, could receive the benefit of a cheapened rate, while those who by the use of another natural resource should have to pay more for the energy they need to perform their business functions. Here is a case where the Government, for the time being, at least, can and should step in with a demand for compensation which would not in any way oppress the average consumer but would detract from the swollen earnings of the agent. Take another case: Let us suppose that by the erection of a dam on a navigable waterway the Federal Government, by the expenditure of large sums of money, has created a potentially large horsepower. Under what process of reasoning should the Federal Government not charge for the utilization of this wealth created by Federal expenditure, and thereby relieve the burden of the general revenues from the tax made necessary by river improvements? There is no sense and no logic to be found in a contrary view. The right to exact compensation is the most fundamental method of control. It is essential, and without its recognition I believe this bill should be defeated.

The bill, even if the committee amendments are adopted, contains some extremely vicious features.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] answered the gentleman from Alabama as to the abuses perpetrated upon the unfortunate Alabama power company, which was driven into Canada. In Canada, at the expiration of their grant, they will practically forfeit everything they have to the Canadian Government. If at the expiration of their grant they receive anything at all, it will be because the Canadian Government believes that they possess something that ought to be bought and is of value to that Government. But in this bill, as originally drafted and even as now amended, there is a great twilight zone of doubt as to what the Government should be compelled to buy at the expiration of the term. The bill reads to the effect that the Government must purchase every item that may depend in whole or in part upon this water power for its support. In other words, if at the end of the lease there be found a trolley system connected with this hydroelectric supply, the Government must buy and pay for every broken-down car, every trolley pole, and every cash register in every car before the people of the United States can resume possession of their own common property. This section must be drastically amended or the bill will threaten perpetual franchises.

Now, let us revert for a moment to the plea of the gentleman from Alabama concerning the production of fertilizers. We know perfectly well, and I am sure that the gentleman himself would admit, that granting the right to private individuals to utilize these water powers for the purpose of manufacturing fertilizers would not result in any perceptible decrease in price of these invaluable necessities of agriculture. This business requires tremendous units of power and large investment. There will be few engaged in the industry. It will be naturally monopolized and not competitive. The people producing these rare products would not need to enter into any formal trust. They would simply have a gentleman's understanding that they should charge just a little less than the importers of the foreign fertilizers charge now, so as to get into the market, and if, as would be natural and has always been the case, they should arrive at any understanding with the foreign exporters and the local importers, the farmers of this country would still be paying a price equivalent to the cost of producing Chilean nitrates, plus a profit to the manufacturers of those nitrates, plus the export duty on those nitrates, and although we would have more fertilizer, it is more than doubtful whether we should get it at a cheapened price, and if the export duty should be raised, our business-like manufacturers would at once raise their prices correspondingly. So all this talk by the gentleman from Alabama of destroying a great beneficial American industry by driving it out of our country is to me absurd. In view, first, of the fact that in Ontario, where they have taken refuge, they are subject to more rigid conditions than anything now proposed or anything in the original dam act; second, that if we liberalize our treatment of these water-power manufacturers they will still be in position to take all the rake-off of export Chilean duty and yield nothing to the consuming public.

I foresee with perfect clarity the time when the Agricultural Department will be granted authority to manufacture and sell these necessary fertilizers at a price representing cost of production plus a sinking fund, and under such conditions we can foresee a real benefit to our agriculture, which needs every legitimate and nonsubsidized encouragement that can be afforded. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has most ably discussed this bill. In my brief time I wish to request of every Member of the House that he read the gentleman's argument and also three bills bearing on this subject—first, the bill from the Public Lands Committee, then the letter of the Secretary of War and his proposed bill, the Adamson bill, and the agreed amendments.

The question of what capital is willing to do under certain circumstances is not hard to demonstrate. In the case of the Connecticut River dam the proponents were willing to accept the conditions proposed by the then Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, which conditions were generally indorsed and included compensation. The Secretary of the Interior and his predecessor have entered into contracts with those who were willing to make developments under reasonable conditions of public control. The Hetch Hetchy bill passed in the last session of Congress absolutely controlled the use of the water from the source to the last trickle over irrigable territory and down to the city of San Francisco in the public interest. It provided for a considerable compensation. If a public utility operated by the public and for the public and without profit may meet such conditions, how much more should a private, profit-making concern submit to adequate control.

It is natural that the water-power crowd should want all they can get. I have personal knowledge of one project where, on the basis of a promise by a former Secretary of the Interior, a firm of brokers in water-power securities started out to sell an issue of $6,000,000 of bonds, when the entire project would have cost vastly less. I am proud to say that I was influential in stopping that particular grab.

I have had long and broad experience with those who represent capital, and I have found that capital is available on reasonable terms provided there is any certainty of payment of interest and repayment of principal. A long struggle in Chicago against the watered-up traction combination proved this definitely. Just as soon as we had fought out the fight, eliminated the water from the stock of the railways, recognized the traction companies as, for the time being, partners of the city, afforded them protection, guaranteed them as far as we could against the element of risk, then and there we secured good service and enormous revenue for the city. As a matter of course we should have transmuted this municipal revenue into lower fares, but the people of Chicago were so anxious for municipal ownership that we were forced to accept their verdict and set these great revenues aside for the ultimate purchase of the street railways, which will be bought out of their surplus earnings. The street railways of Chicago since that time have freely advertised that they are in partnership with the city of Chicago, and that their bonds are good, because their issuance is supervised by the city. In some such way as this these water powers must be handled. If we fail to operate them for ourselves in the public interest, if we believe that it is better policy to establish agents to operate them when we might ourselves perform this function, it is our bounden duty not only to treat our agents fairly but to see to it that those who come after us may in their day and generation have a fair chance to resume the functions which we, in our time, have seen fit to delegate to others, and this is the whole crux of the situation.

The question of Federal versus State rights is largely irrelevant. I, for one, thoroughly believe in the thought expressed by the President to the effect that the States have necessary functions, and that the question of proper performance of obvious duties is of more consequence than the continued assertion and wrangling over doubtful rights. The discussion should be rather as to what the States should do rather than as to what they can prevent the Federal Government from doing. The public welfare is the question, and not limitless gabfests over what men thought or did not think or said or did not say 150 years ago.

Whenever and wherever a State shows an intent and an ability to control public utilities in the interests of the people, then and in that event I am willing to delegate to that State large authority; but in the meantime, as Representatives of the National Government, empowered and commissioned to look after the public welfare, it is our solemn duty to use whatever power we have to secure that end.

And now, in passing, I wish to make a statement concerning the fallacy upon which rests this whole structure of private control of public assets, and that is the private ownership of land. I am not going to talk in favor of any theory of land taxation or land tenure. I merely wish to state that nothing more absurd from an economic standpoint was ever conceived than this theory of final private control of this fundamental necessity, without any restraint against waste or destruction, and dedicated to the grantee and his heirs and assigns forever. It is this fallacy that has destroyed our timber, that has monopolized our coal, our oil. It is this fallacy that has permitted the extortionate extravagance of land speculation and the most tremendous charge laid upon distribution, which charge will be found in the vast aggregated item of rent. In the Ferris bill we put into words a theory and a truth, namely, that lands, rights of way, and water rights should not be subject to the unearned increment; that those coming after us should not suffer by being more numerous than we are, which has been the affliction of every country guilty of increasing in population under this doctrine. In this bill it has been taken for granted that the water-power people were not only to be protected in rights that they were to acquire for practically nothing from the public, but they were to be granted privileges of speculation in land that was not acquired from the public; that they were to profit by the breeding of people, just as every landowner profits by that commonplace performance. This bill must be amended in this particular. We who fought the fight in the Public Lands Committee and put forward our bill thoroughly realize that our duty lay in using whatever power was ours to protect the future. In the Hetch Hetchy bill, where the city of San Francisco owned more than half the land to be flooded, and had made immense expenditures to obtain water rights, we used the leverage of the right to refuse in such a way as to impose conditions in the public interest. On the other hand, in this bill, as drafted, the water-power people could take anything they required on the public domain, whether or not it was the key to the situation, on payment of 5 per cent of its existing value. I leave it to the Members of this House which view is correct, whether it is our sworn duty to use every means in our power to protect the public welfare or whether, as trustees of the public domain, we should weakly surrender that public domain on any such absurd and inadequate basis.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would state that in our contention we have back of us the rising sentiment in favor of democracy and equalized opportunity; and it is my belief, although I am not authorized so to state, that we have back of us a man in the White House who will use a crowbar for a pen in vetoing any measure that is not duly protective of the public interest. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr ADAMSON], I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to couple with that the condition that I made.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to couple with it also the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Connecticut will take care of himself.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to all gentlemen who spoke upon this bill revising and extending their remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall object unless the gentleman from Missouri is allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think there is no difficulty about the gentleman being yielded that much time.

Mr. HENSLEY. I only ask for three minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield him two.

Mr. HENSLEY. I thank the gentlemen.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to say that it is my purpose to support the pending bill before the House, but that is not the purpose for which I have asked for time at present.

I hardly think any person on the floor of this House will charge me with being a partisan. While I am a Democrat, I have at all times put my country above my party. Vastly more concerned am I about the welfare of this Nation, the prosperity and happiness of the people, than I am about the success of my party and the achievement of my personal ambitions. In this frame of mind, and with a deep desire to know the whole truth and to do my full duty I have attended the sessions of this House continuously.

Yes; I have been here, regardless of the hot, sultry weather and in the face of opposition in my district. I have every day given close and careful attention to everything that has been said regarding the conditions of the country as the changes have been rung on this floor.

I have listened very patiently to many, very many, somewhat remarkable speeches. Many of these have been made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. When there has come a lull in business, for any reason whatever, the gentleman from Washington has always bobbed up serenely and filled in the time with a wail, the like of which has rarely been heard outside of Congress or a menagerie. I sincerely hope that his doleful story has been so often told that it has disgusted the Republican side of the House, as I feel sure it has the country at large.

I have tried hard to follow him in his skyrocketing oratory, but who can follow the eagle flights of that pessimestic mind? I have observed his grotesque antics in his attempts to marshal the masses under his flag of deception, and I have grown weary of his performances. Who cares to get down into the slime and mire in order to appreciate the purposes of the gentleman from Washington or the methods he employs to further them? I have also heard the fine tenor voice of my genial and brilliant friend from Wyoming joining in a like refrain, until between them they have almost led me to doubt conditions. I have almost been led to believe at times that the administration had committed some grievous error. But let us see.

What is it, gentlemen, that causes you to complain so vociferously against this Democratic administration? Let us put our heads together and think over these matters seriously and analyze the situation carefully and discover, if we can, the reason or basis in fact for all this noise. Do you think, my worthy friends, that you are voicing the sentiments of any considerable number of the plain people of this Nation in your carefully prepared tirades in this your systematic campaign of abuse against the administration? Do you suppose the people of this Nation desire a return to Cannonism in this House when committees were selected by the Speaker instead of by the membership, yea, when legislation was autocratically controlled by the man in the chair? Do you suppose the people you represent here desire to return to the old régime when legislation was throttled by the few? The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and many others have told us time after time of such performances in the past. Do you Republicans desire to return to power in order that you may repeal the pension law that bears the name of that grand old Roman, Gen. SHERWOOD, of Ohio? Dare you lay your hands on that law which, in a measure, was fashioned after the Sulloway bill, which failed of enactment in the Sixty-first Congress when you were in power? Do you suppose for a moment that the old soldiers of this land desire to see you returned to power in the face of this just legislation which properly recognizes their services and enables them to enjoy the comforts of life in their old age? You certainly do not desire an opportunity to repeal this legislation.

Do you think for a moment the people of this Nation wish to return to the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot tariff as against the Underwood law? The Underwood tariff bill was written intelligently and in the interest of the whole people, not for the favored classes. No master mind of the Manufacturers' Association guided the hand that wrote the schedules in the Underwood tariff bill. There was not the faintest suspicion that lobbyists influenced either the writing or passage of this law. It was enacted by a vote of 255 to 104, many Republicans voting for it. Are these loud lamentations caused by the administration having put upon the statute books the income tax, which requires the wealth of the country to bear a just share of the burdens of Government? As you know, this law requires the rich to pay taxes upon their riches and to that extent removes the burden from the poorer classes. You know that this law is popular with the masses, and you dare not lay hands upon it.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. I would rather not yield; but if it is just a question, I will.

Mr. GOOD. It is a question. I would like to ask the gentleman what Republicans voted for the tariff bill. I think he is mistaken about that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. STAFFORD, was one.

Mr. GOOD. He was not elected on a Republican ticket.

Mr. BOOHER. All the sensible Republicans voted for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENSLEY. Several Republicans of the House and Senate who were fearless and patriotic voted for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. Are you weeping and wailing because we Democrats in Congress routed the American Manufacturers' Association from these halls? Do you wish to see the representatives of this association again domiciled in this Capitol with Mulhall enthroned as its legislative agent on a fabulous salary? Are you sad because you no longer have the paid agents of giant combinations of capital acting as clerks of the committees of Congress and receiving large sums as presents from these powerful interests for their nefarious and corrupt practices? Do you not, gentlemen, remember how you ridiculed and scouted the idea that a lobby infested this Capitol when this fact was declared by the President of the United States? What have you to say now after you have read the testimony taken by the investigating committees of both Houses of this Congress? You know that this testimony shows conclusively that there existed a most powerful lobby which had for its original purpose the defeat of all legislation inimical to certain great corporations and protected interests. If this Democratic administration had only to its credit the routing from the Capitol of the most powerful and corrupt lobby that ever existed in this or any other country, I am quite sure the people would be entirely satisfied and would say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." If you were returned to power, would you allow this lobby to return? We found it here, and sent it into exile. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why did not you? Do you desire its return?

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact, since he has referred to the manner in which legislation was conducted during the Republican administration, that under the old régime a good many bills were carried to a well-ventilated morgue for the disposition of that kind of legislation that they were not in favor of. That was particularly true, as developed in the inquiry by the Judiciary Committee in the testimony of a gentleman who had charge of a subcommittee for the purpose of controlling legislation which it was not desirable to vote upon. He held that position for nearly seven years. That was the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Littlefield, who stated in his testimony that he was appointed for that purpose and had sufficient men appointed with him to see that no legislation got out of his committee that was not desirable. He thought that was the proper function of that committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What committee was that?

Mr. CLINE. The Judiciary Committee; and the members of the National Association of Manufacturers thought so much of what the gentleman did that they spent $18,000 for his election in Maine in 1908, and as a further testimonial of his ability they handed him $3,000 to defray his expenses to the Pacific coast to recuperate his health. The fact was that this committee constituted an automatic, self-oiling, ball-bearing institution that worked with the noiselessness of a passing summer cloud. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENSLEY. I thank the gentleman from Indiana. I recall that the gentleman from Indiana was on the special committee which investigated the lobby situation.

Do you desire to return to that condition when the great banking houses in New York maintained a secret agent in the Treasury Department to communicate in advance all important rulings of the department that might affect their interests? Certainly such agents were not domiciled here to protect the interests of the masses of the people of the United States. Do you complain of these changes? Honestly, gentlemen, do you object to the Treasury Department's requiring banks to pay interest on Government deposits? Are you really sorry that some millions in interest have been paid on the people's money within the year? You did not require the great banks to pay interest on deposits when you were in power. Why did not you? While you did this for the powerful banks, yet when the people needed money they were compelled to pay the banks all the interest the traffic would bear. You did not make favorites of them. This was a beautiful plan of copartnership between the Government and the national banks at the expense of the people. Under a Democratic administration the Secretary of the Treasury distributes the money of the people, not to a few favored banking institutions free of charge, but all over the country as the needs of business require at a fixed rate of interest. Are the people of the United States complaining of these things?

For many years the laboring classes appealed in vain for progressive legislation, legislation which common decency and the instincts of humanity should have prompted you to enact. This legislation had for its purpose the improvement of labor conditions throughout the land, but in your committees all such bills "slept the sleep that knows no waking." When they "asked for bread, you gave them a stone"; when they "asked for a fish, you gave them a serpent."

This administration has responded in every way possible to the call of these millions of toiling citizens. If our form of government is to be perpetuated and our liberties vouchsafed to posterity, and if our flag is to be kept unsullied, if our homes are to be safeguarded against the despoiler, it will be through the efforts of the men and women of this land who "eat their bread in the sweat of their face." Why did not you respond to their reasonable demands?

A Democratic Congress originated the bill which placed a representative of labor in the Cabinet. I am proud of the fact that I was a member of the committee which reported the bill, and I appreciate the honor of having assisted in its passage. To-day we have a Secretary of Labor, the Hon. W. B. Wilson, who sprang from the loins of labor and whose heartbeats and emotions are in accord with the hopes and aspirations of the great body of toilers in this land. Do you gentlemen wish to take this Department of Labor out of the Cabinet? The bill passed the House by almost a solid vote, many Republicans voting for it. The labor people worked a long time to secure this recognition. Do you think the great body of American people will turn against the Democratic Party for responding to the call of labor in this way? Do you think, Mr. Standpatter, that labor will truckle at your feet and "kiss the hand that smote it in the past"?

This administration has enacted laws shortening hours of labor; this House has also passed a bill to prohibit the importation of convict-made goods. The anti-injunction law is to the credit of this Congress. Do you wish to be returned to power in order to repeal any of these? Would you dare touch one of them? The amendment to the Erdman Act, which provides mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in disputes between capital and labor, was a great achievement. The bill passed almost unanimously. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] commended not only the act but the President in unstinted measure.

In the name of high heaven, gentlemen, what is it that is troubling you? You can not be violently opposed to the currency law, for many of you voted for its passage. You were never able to write and put upon the statute books a currency law. Those of you who prize your country more highly than you do your party, especially the Progressives, joined hands with us in passing some of these remedial laws, and it is to your credit that you did so.

Big business tells us that no trust legislation should be enacted at this session. Do you agree with big business? Do you believe that we should adjourn and leave our work unfinished? However much I may desire to go home after being here nearly continuously for three years, I prefer to stay and discharge my duties to the people of the Nation, even though I suffer defeat for renomination at the hands of my constituents. This is the test, and every Member should meet it squarely. We promised to take this Government out of the deadly grasp of big business and restore it to the common people, and by the eternal we are going to do it, if it takes all summer.

This House has gone on record for good roads, something you never did in all the days you were in power. We believe in internal improvement, and are responding to the will of the people in this regard. Do you object to this? Then, why did you not register your votes against the good-roads bill? It passed the House almost unanimously.

Have we ruined the country by responding to the voice of the people in providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people? We also provided for publicity of campaign contributions, to prevent corruption in politics. The people believe these are good laws. Are you opposed to them? Why did so many of you vote for them?

I have briefly enumerated only a few of the accomplishments of this Democratic administration. We hope much may follow. I am persuaded that any candid individual, irrespective of party affiliations, will say, without equivocation or mental reservation, that this administration in less than two years has put more just remedial legislation upon the statute books than you placed there in all the 16 years you were in power. [Applause.] Strong Republicans subscribe to this fact, and many of them will join us. They are patriotic and more interested in the proper administration of affairs and the prosperity and happiness of all the people than they are in the success of the Republican Party.

As to our foreign policy, that you can hardly find language violent enough to condemn satisfactorily to yourself, what radical changes have been made in our foreign policy that merit such condemnation? What does the Republican Party desire as regards Mexico? Do you desire occupation by our Army? Do you want to go on record as favoring conquest? You do know that such a curse would necessitate, first and last, the sacrifice of thousands of American boys, saddening and desolating many homes in this beautiful land. Would you shoulder arms and go to the front, or would you send your boys? No; you would do neither, but would be found in company with our friend from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL, "staying here on the job." [Laughter.] Do you not know that big business, such as you and your party fostered for so many years when you were in power, is very largely responsible for existing conditions in Mexico? And do you not know that in case of war every American boy whose life would be sacrificed would be a sacrifice on the altar of big business? Our Nation could not profit by such a war. Only the vampires that are now sapping the lifeblood of that country would be benefited. The red blood of American youth spilled in such a war would only enhance the value of the investments of big business. Such a war would be destructive of the sacred principles upon which our glorious Republic is founded. Do you really want this thing done?

Do you not know that you can just as certainly dishonor the flag of your country and drag its folds in the mire by improper conduct on this floor as you could by turning your back to the enemy on the field of battle? War of this kind—or any other kind, in fact—I pray, may never come to our country. I do not want to entail an indebtedness of hundreds of millions of dollars unto our children and unto our children's children; much less do I wish to sacrifice the flower of American citizenship in such a war as a conflict with Mexico would be.

Thank God we have a President whose heart is made of flesh, not adamant; who is big enough, patriotic enough [applause]; yes, and determined enough, to repress and suppress the short-sighted, unpatriotic gentlemen who so foolishly counsel a declaration of war. [Applause.] I wish to call your attention and the attention of the country to the fact that during the last years of Mr. Taft's administration conditions in Mexico were about as bad as they are now. Men, women, and children were being killed even over the border line in the United States. These were our citizens, if you please, and while it appeared to be popular to assail President Taft at that time, for he was on his last pegs, yet not a Democrat raised his voice against the President of the United States, for he was the President of all the people. Not a Democratic voice was heard in condemnation of the foreign policy of the last administration. But how times have changed since a Democrat occupies the White House. It remained for a Republican to assail with all the bitterness of which he was capable, vituperation unsurpassed, the President of the United States when he has pursued the very same policy a Republican President pursued before him. Now, quit your croaking and join hands with us to make better and more glorious this great country of ours. If you were returned to power, which is impossible to contemplate, because of the intelligence and patriotism of the American people, you could not consistently make any material changes in the administrative policies now being pursued.

A few days ago I saw a cartoon in that great Democratic paper of Missouri, the St. Louis Republic. It was a picture of a huge bag being filled with wheat and upon it were the figures showing the estimated bumper wheat crop for the season. Off in one corner was shown a withered tan-faced creature, a calamity croaker cowering and quaking in dire distress over what he witnessed. In some respects I think the figure resembled the gentleman from Washington. [Laughter.]

But you say the administration is not entitled to credit for a bumper wheat crop. If this is true, and I do not dispute it, then the Democratic administration is not responsible for the devastating and withering drought prevalent in my district and should not be held responsible for it.

We must move forward. The welfare of the whole country depends upon progression, not professions of progression, but progression written in the statutes for the good of mankind. We can not stand still if we hope to attain unto the best, but we must press onward and upward to a higher and nobler plane of civilization. We must rise to that point where he who toils will be able, because of equitable and just laws and conditions, to enjoy the full usufruct of his toil. [Applause.] Our Government must be so organized and administered that we may properly distribute the products of the mines, the factory, and the field, so as to give equal opportunities to every individual and a square deal to all mankind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all who speak upon this bill be allowed to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair doubts if that can be done in committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it can, for all who speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all who speak on this bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. If we can get unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] may proceed for five minutes, I will not object.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to Mr. Harry A. Slattery, the secretary of the National Conservation Association, for some historical data in regard to this legislation that I should like to incorporate in my extended remarks on this bill, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to record my hearty approval of the bill under consideration introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], known as the Adamson amendment to the general dam act.

It is not my purpose to consider the subject matter of the bill in detail or the amendments to be offered by various gentlemen. However valuable the suggestions are that may be offered in the way of amendments, in order that the prospect of legislation may not be endangered, it seems to me preferable that we should accept the results of the continued study that has been made by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

While the gentlemen anxious to secure the best arrangement possible for the Government are to be commended for their zeal, they must not lose sight of the fact that private capital must be induced to invest in these projects and conditions must not be made so severe that a suitable return on their investments becomes impossible.

It would seem to me that the differences which have arisen during the discussion of the bill and the efforts to secure amendments to it are the result of a possible interlocking of authority between two great departments of our Government—the War Department and the Interior Department. It has been a well-established regulation that the control of navigable streams should come under the supervision of the War Department.

In the settlement of the vast sections of the West the authority of the Interior Department over streams in public domains has been increasingly recognized.

We of the East have not had occasion to consider this dual authority or the authority of the Interior Department, and in the present instance we are very anxious that the confusion between the respective departments should not endanger the possibilities of the enactment of this legislation.

In reading the redraft of the bill of the committee, it would seem to me that this possibility is to all intents and purposes so completely removed that it becomes a very minor consideration.

The bill in question deals with two great problems—first, navigation; second, development of electrical energy.

While the Federal Government must primarily consider the question from the standpoint of navigation, it nevertheless must recognize the interdependence of the one upon the other in the cases wherein this bill is applicable.

It is in this mutual relationship that my district is greatly interested in this bill. Its enactment will be the beginning of a long-delayed act of justice to an important part of my district.

For many years we have heard a great deal about the conservation of the natural resources of the country, especially as applied to the West, but gross negligence has been shown toward the conservation of the resources and opportunities afforded by one of nature's most beautiful streams.

Frequent reference has been made during this debate to what is a navigable stream, and as a matter of record I will insert here the Supreme Court decision:

EXTRACT FROM SYLLABUS OF A DECISION BY THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE CASE OF "THE DANIEL BALL" (10 WALL., 557), DEFINING A NAVIGABLE WATER.

Those rivers are public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. Rivers are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

And they constitute navigable waters in the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States when they form in their ordinary condition by themselves, or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which the commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

(NOTE.—Rafting and the floating of logs are recognized methods of navigation.)

Flowing between the States of New Hampshire and Vermont, across the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut for 345 miles, the Connecticut River most certainly comes within this decision. From its mouth to Hartford, Conn., a distance of 52 miles, there is a 12-foot channel, and boats of that draft use that portion of the river. Above Hartford it is navigable but not navigated, and it is to secure this desired result that we ask for the passage of this bill.

My colleague, Mr. GILLETT, has already spoken of the long-continued effort to secure an appropriation to make the river commercially navigable, of the opposition of the War Department, and finally of the approval by the engineers of the scheme to combine an electrical development for navigation.

When it has seemed that results were about to be accomplished new difficulties have arisen until, finally, in the last Congress the constitutional question of the relationship between State and Federal authority arose to defeat or delay the proposition. This having been now thoroughly discussed and understood, and the Supreme Court having passed upon the question, we ask that no further quibbles should be placed in the way of the final accomplishment so long and so eagerly desired.

The Legislatures of Connecticut and Massachusetts through special commissions have both given their approval to the plan proposed and have urged prompt congressional action.

Briefly stated it is this: At Windsor Locks, Conn., there are an old dam and locks built under charter from the Connecticut Legislature in 1824. This right is now controlled by the Connecticut River Co., which has ample financial backing. The company will accept such form of contract as the Government and State may offer. It is prepared to construct a dam and locks at very large expense—approximately $5,000,000—presenting them to the Government for navigation purposes, provided they can use the power for electrical development.

It is estimated that water sufficient to develop 35,000 horsepower is now aimlessly and uselessly flowing to the sea.

Conservationists are defeating their own ends if they oppose the use of this tremendous amount of power, which can supply an area having a population of several hundred thousand people with cheaper light, heat, and power, nor should the question of Federal or State authority or that of authority of the War or Interior Departments longer delay this development.

We should certainly have sufficient confidence in the knowledge of as important committee as the one having this matter in charge to properly safeguard the public interests.

In addition to this an almost incalculable benefit will come to the people of this section through navigation on the Connecticut River as far as Holyoke by the construction of a channel 12 feet in depth at a comparatively small cost to the Government.

Freight tonnage of the section is over 3,000,000 tons per annum, upon which there will be an estimated saving of about 20 per cent in rates.

It is estimated that there will be a saving of between 60 and 80 cents per ton on the million and half tons of coal consumed annually on the places directly affected.

I have only thus briefly referred to the great benefit to the entire business interests of western Massachusetts this bill will permit.

There was never a time when the legislation was more needed than now. The section is hard hit by Democratic times. Business is at the lowest ebb it has been in many years.

The manufacturing centers of Springfield, Holyoke, Chicopee, and West Springfield manufacture goods valued at over $100,000,000 annually.

The great paper mills of Holyoke alone manufacture about 125,000 tons annually.

I therefore ask for its favorable consideration in order that this long-delayed benefit to the section I represent may be soon under way and that the wasteful negligence of the past may be promptly overcome.

We can then have a practical illustration of the benefits of conservation.

The people of the section have waited patiently; their patience has ceased to be a virtue.

I ask that Congress shall not again disappoint them and deprive them of their just rights, for which nature needs so little assistance to bring practical results. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the Washington Post, an independent newspaper, published an editorial entitled "The farmer loses," it appearing in the issue of the Post of July 14, 1914. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing that editorial in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the article about?

Mr. GOOD. About the losses sustained by the farmer through the announcement of the Democratic tariff law.

Mr. LLOYD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Washington Post is a Democratic newspaper?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; an independent newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

"THE FARMER LOSES.

"In the 10 months ended April, 1914, the value of foreign foodstuffs imported into the United States increased $10,000,000, or $1,000,000 a month. This money, which should have gone to the American farmer, went to foreign farmers.

"In the same period the exports of American foodstuffs decreased $64,416,000, or $6,400,000 a month.

"The adverse balance against the American farmer, so far as dealings with the outside world are concerned, is $75,000,000 in 10 months.

"During the 10 months ended April, 1914, there were imported 20,058,998 bushels of oats, as against 714,767 bushels imported during the same period ended April, 1913. Comparing the same periods, there were imported 1,854,054 bushels of wheat against 769,329; other breadstuffs, $2,602,952 against $1,362,630; fruits, $26,155,168 against $21,635,382; nuts, $722,217 against $636,290; butter, $1,633,515 against $253,513; cheese, $9,302,438 against $7,683,390; olive oil, $6,444,247 against $5,815,810; prepared vegetables, $3,015,545 against $2,772,100; fresh vegetables, $1,468,396, against $1,308,821. The importation of eggs during the 10 months ended April, 1914, amounted to 5,043,765 dozens, valued at $1,000,000.

"These are staples produced by American farms, orchards, and gardens. The new tariff reduces the duty upon these articles and opens the market to foreign farmers. The foreigner has seized this opportunity and is now making $1,000,000 a month which formerly went to the American farmer.

"The consumer gets no benefit from this tariff reduction. The price has not gone down on a single article mentioned. The high tariff formerly kept the foreigner out and gave this business to the American farmer. The new tariff throws the business to the foreign farmer, who, with the middleman, pockets the benefit, and the consumer pays as much as he did before. The only loser is the American farmer.

"This loss of $1,000,000 a month covers only 10 months of the new tariff. It is natural that the loss should be greater as soon as foreign farmers awaken to the splendid opportunity offered by the American market. The more they take advantage of this opportunity the more the American farmer will lose.

"The only way to prevent this loss to the American farmer is to put the bars up again, and shut out the foreigner. The experiment has been in effect long enough to show that it does not decrease the cost of living.

"Maybe this item of $1,000,000 a month loss through the low tariff will be borne in mind by the American farmer when he votes next November for Congressmen who frame tariff bills."

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Gen. W. H. Standish, now of my district, formerly attorney general of the State of South Dakota, who is very deeply interested in the subject of dams, this letter being upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

REEDS SPRING, MO., July 16, 1914.

Hon. J. J. RUSSELL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RUSSELL: I am in receipt of the Adamson water-power bill, H. R. 16053. So far as it goes it is a very fine bill.

I inclose to you a petition, signed by 760 of the residents of this county at six different post offices, to wit: Hurley, Crane, Elsey, Galena, Cape Fair, and Reeds Spring. The petition reads thus:

"To the Sixty-third Congress of the United States of America:

"Our homes are in Stone County, Mo., where natural water-power sites exist in certain places, which, in our opinion, should be developed by the use of dam and tunnel together, and thereby retain for farming purposes a large portion of our bottom river lands and cause a more economical development of water power than by dams alone, and we believe this mode of development will give cheaper rates and better results to the public than by the use of dams alone. We believe the whole subject of where dams should be placed and whether tunnels should be used in connection with dams should be first submitted to the public-service commission of our State, with authority for it to draw any bill for Congress which said commission believes would be for the best interest of the public, and include in such bill a provision for a tunnel in connection with the dam where the commission believes it would be for the interests of the locality and the public at large. This petition would require only such modification of the pending bill in Congress as to authorize tunnels in connection with dams where the interests of the public would be promoted thereby, and that applications for dam construction should be first submitted to the public-service commission of the State, for it to examine into the matter and report its advice either to Congress or to the War Department agency.

"The public-service commission of the State is peculiarly fitted to do this work; better so, probably, than any other body in the United States. Your bill recognizes that this body shall have the right to fix and control all the business of the company done within the State where the dam is to be located and the power distributed. In the State of Missouri this body controls the amount of stock and bonds that shall be issued, and every step from the beginning to the close of construction, and everything thereafter in the operation; so much so, that if the manager of the company should be the majority owner of all the property of the plant, and such manager should not comply with the orders of the board, it could and would remove him and install another manager. In this way this board at once learns the cost of building a dam, either whether it is a solid concrete dam or a hollow, reinforced concrete dam, so that after the first dam has been constructed in the State and the matter thrashed over in the issuing of stock and bonds and the fixing of rates, this public-service body, when the measurements for any plan are submitted to it, can approximately tell at once what the cost of any proposed dam will be without the taking of any testimony. Besides, our public-service body has expert engineers employed by it to go out and examine the site and report on its suitableness. Where there are such conditions as exist in Stone County, Mo., Taney County, Mo., and in other portions of Missouri, with crooked rivers located in the mountain part of the State, and there are narrow bends that can be had where it is certain that a tunnel to form all water-power necessities can be put through the bend for probably one-third of what a second dam can be made, and the pondage land around the bend that would be submerged purchased—and there are plenty of such places—and where the river around the bend is of no use for navigation, and the people of the locality prefer and petition for the tunnel instead of a second dam, there should be a right vested in this local body to investigate into the matter and report to Congress or the War Department their conclusions.

"This authority for the State board to thus act is made clear in the Adamson bill. When such proposition comes before the State board, the State board can fix a day for the hearing, when contractors who do tunnel work who have already examined the site for the proposed tunnel will appear before the board and submit their bids to build a tunnel which would take the place of the second dam. The State board can and naturally would require of them a safe bond for the performance of their bid in case the Federal authority should authorize a tunnel in connection with the dam and thereby save the construction of a second dam and the submergence of probably thousands of acres of land that would lie in and around the bend between the intake and output of the proposed tunnel, land in which in all cases is the richest in the State.

"This examination and hearing need not take over 30 days from the time the matter is presented to the State board for the State board to make its report. The interest on the amount that will be saved by having the tunnel instead of a second dam will go that much to reduce the cost of power to the public and tend to increase water-power development, and will lessen the sum to be paid for the property at the end of the 50-year period, when the permit is to expire. The people of the locality will not prefer the tunnel where the river around the bend is needed for navigation, nor will the State board recommend it. This competition that will be created by the right to bid will prevent the possibility of collusion between the officers of the water-power company and those who do the construction, which could be secret and never discovered or discoverable by the State board. If the department or Congress shall authorize dam construction in our mountain regions at places where the back water would intrude on that part of the river that would be in a bend, between where the intake and output of such a tunnel would be, the possibility of having a tunnel thereafter would be destroyed.

"After the dam would be authorized by Federal authority the State Utility Board could not authorize a tunnel, even though it might save a million of dollars in the development. If the State board is suitable and competent to authorize everything about the development after it is once authorized, it is a suitable body to examine and advise the Federal authority before the project is started, and this plan will aid the State board in its supervision of the development after it is started, because it will know to a certainty what the tunnel is to cost or has cost. It will be safer for the public to have tunnels made in such cases than dams to take up the fall around the bend, because no matter how careful our engineering bureaus are, with dams we are liable to have Johnstown floods, digging out by the water on the lower side of the dam, so that when a flood comes it will tip over, as was the case of the big dam in the Missoula River near Great Falls, Mont., a few years ago. Only a few years ago we had two great dam washouts, causing the loss of life and much property. Under this new bill water-power development is likely to proceed ten times faster than it ever has before, which is desirable, as the public needs the cheaper power, but with this ten times of increase there will be ten times the chance for washouts of dams. A tunnel never washes out. It will last forever without an accident. The dam near the mouth of the tunnel which creates the reservoir or pondage will receive but a small portion of the water over it that would go over it if there was no tunnel to draw the pondage off, and therefore it will be made more safe, and around the bend when floods come ties and timber can be floated the same as now, without any injury to the power property.

"In relation to the diversion of the water of all our small streams through a tunnel, the Government now has 22½ miles of tunnel of the same character in which it diverts water from large rivers for irrigation purposes, because it will be of greater benefit to the public than to leave the water in the river. But here the water goes immediately into the river and saves thousands of acres for farming."

I desire to call your attention to the character of the petitioners for tunnels in connection with dams in water-power developments. Many of these petitioners are personally known to you; some of them are known to Mr. HAMLIN, of Springfield, and to our Senators. To begin with, this petition is signed by all of the men who have been sent from our county to our legislature during the last eight years. Two of these are Progressives—Hon. Truman S. Powell and Theodore Tromley. One, W. C. Woods, was a Taft Republican. The other, W. D. Craig, is a Wilson Democrat, and was elected as a Democrat to the legislature. The petition is practically unanimous from these different towns. It contains all our bankers, our county officers, our editors, our lawyers that have had a chance to see it, and nearly every merchant—men of the utmost integrity and clearest judgment and who know local conditions thoroughly. I hope that the authority which they petition for will be incorporated into the Adamson bill to authorize State utility boards to have 30 days' time to consider and recommend applications that are to be made to Congress, or the War Department, for dam permits. I see no harm of any kind that can arise from this, no prejudical delay to the enterprise in protection to stockholders and bondholders as well as the public, but a large reduction in rates, the saving of millions of acres of bottom lands in the United States for farming purposes, and less expense to the Government to take over the property at the end of the permit, because at that time I look for the Government to own and operate every water power in the United States.

Sincerely, yours,

W. H. STANDISH.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I take occasion at this time to repeat what the chairman of this committee stated on Saturday last. He said:

I will remind the Committee of the Whole that there is not a single amendment in the 14 that the committee is going to offer that is inconsisent with the bill as originally drawn and introduced in this House. We discussed them over and over again, and we suggested these amendments and they were agreed to by the other side.

I further desire to state that I made this statement in opening the argument, that the fears of the gentleman were entirely imaginary; that the English language did not justify any such conclusion as they tried to deduce from the language of the bill. Mr. Chairman, I am so happy that the amendments we are going to propose, and of which I gave notice, are satisfactory to the gentleman that I have nothing further to say. I hope we will proceed with the debate and adopt as soon as possible this great and valuable constructive measure on the most important subject to the country that has been before Congress for a long time.

I heartily agree with the latter portion of that statement as to the importance of this subject. I do not quite share in the chairman's optimistic view, that the amendments which he has offered are all of the amendments that are necessary.

DEFECTS OF AMENDED COMMITTEE BILL.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, through its chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, presents an amended bill, bearing the label "Committee print, with amendments."

A number of the defects noted in the original bill are remedied, in part or whole, in the new amendments. But, I submit, the cardinal shortcomings of the original bill are still inherent after amendment.

Among the defects which have not yet been reached are the following:

First. The amended bill utterly fails to provide anything like definite, tangible, authoritative, and efficient regulation of hydroelectric utilities, notwithstanding the fact that the bill is based on the doctrine that a hydroelectric utility is a monopoly and that, as such, it must be subject in its operation to effective regulation both in the interests of the Government and the consumers.

Second. There is no provision for joint or interlocking Federal and State supervision of such hydroelectric utilities, although the electric current generated by such projects enters both local and interstate commerce, and therefore requires the joint or cooperative regulation of the Federal Government and the State, if regulation is to be effective, with no "twilight zone" of governmental jurisidction.

Third. The bill still provides:

That the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of 50 years—

Which leaves the Government no option or leeway in regard to the term of the grant, which might readily be provided by substituting the more salutary phrase, "for the period of no longer than 50 years."

Fourth. The bill gives the Secretary of War jurisdiction in fixing charges in two fields over which the Secretary of the Interior has administrative authority, namely, in the case, first, of "headwater improvements of every kind, nature, and description, including storage reservoirs or forested watersheds or land owned, located, or reserved by the United States at the headwaters of any navigable stream"; and second, in the case of "lands acquired by the United States through purchase or condemnation and any part of the public lands withdrawn by the President from entry or disposition for the sole purpose of promoting navigation." Joint control by the Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of War, or by the water-power commission of three, as proposed in House bill 17854, would certainly be more conducive to a harmonious, efficient, and businesslike administration of such public domain and headwaters than by giving the Secretary of War jurisdiction in a field which distinctly belongs to the Secretary of the Interior.

Fifth. H. R. 16053 still lacks a proper provision for priority of public purpose and use of Federal water powers as against commercial use, and in that respect is inferior to the water-power acts of all progressive nations.

Sixth. H. R. 16053 still retains in section 15 that indefinitely worded exemption from the provisions of the antitrust law, which would prove so useful to a water-power trust or hydroelectric group, namely:

Provided, however, That it shall be lawful, under the approval of the Secretary of War, for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary by supplementing the currents or power, and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business—

And so forth.

Nobody knows what this provision means, unless it is to give a water-power aggregation full immunity to do what it pleases.

Seventh. Under section 13 the bill makes all the provisions of the proposed act a vested right to the favored grantee, and deprives Congress of its customary right to "alter, amend, or repeal" unless and until "Congress determines that the conditions of consent have been violated." And unless "the conditions of consent have been violated," the United States is made by this section liable for such "alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested in such dam." Such a provision is plainly untenable.

The optimism of the chairman of the committee is only exceeded by his geniality. I know that he is anxious to get a bill on this subject that will do justice to the people of this country, and in doing so there can be no more valuable service rendered by any Member of this House than to honestly and earnestly assist in getting the best bill. I do not quite agree with my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who just addressed us, that we should always abide by the judgment of our committee. Committees are instituted for the purpose of giving certain subjects their special consideration. They perform a valuable service, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has done valuable service by bringing in a bill that furnishes us an outline out of which we possibly can whip into shape and make a useful and efficient bill. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts is willing to accept this bill. He was willing in the last Congress, or his people were, to accept what was known as the Connecticut dam bill, and this bill, possibly, is more favorable to his people. I wish they had what they desire, and I feel confident that they need just such legislation as they have been trying to get for years.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman realizes, I trust, that the interest my people have in the matter is that of navigation very largely. I hope I made plain in my remarks what the citizens in western Massachusetts desire, and that is to secure the navigation of the Connecticut River, and the development of power is only incidental to that desire. I trust the gentleman realizes that.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I do not know just the importance of the difference between the two purposes you want to accomplish, but I feel sure the project is worthy and that the gentleman should have legislation sufficient to help him realize it to its full extent.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman for his confidence, because I am sure it is deserved.

ANALYSIS OF BILL BY THE HOUSE LEADER.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. This House has been favored by a learned and exhaustive analysis and defense of the original and amended bill by the leader of the House majority, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Alabama. All who listened to his able and instructive address, which covers five pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, were not only entertained by the elaborate and eloquent character of the address, but also by these two facts, namely, that the subject matter which we propose to legislate upon in this proposed act is one of most vital and far-reaching import to the industrial and commercial development of America, and, second, that this bill in its finally amended form may become one of the most historic monuments of this Congress.

There are two propositions laid down by the gentleman from Alabama to which I desire to call your attention. They reach to the heart of this measure. They have a peculiar bearing upon the purpose of this bill and the ways and means of carrying the purpose into practical execution. Moreover, these two propositions are not consistent.

The first proposition is that hydroelectric developments are "natural monopolies performing a public-utility service," and the second proposition is that "the most important feature of the bill" is that which "authorizes a recapture of the dam and its accessory works."

If the purpose of this bill was to establish public ownership and operation of the Federal water powers of this country, I should agree most emphatically with the gentleman from Alabama and with the members of the committee who father this bill that "the most important feature of the bill, so far as the public is concerned, is that provision in the bill that authorizes a recapture of the dam and its accessory works in the interest of the public," as so eloquently stated by the gentleman from Alabama.

But the object of this bill is not the public ownership and operation of water powers, but private ownership and operation of hydroelectric developments. Its purpose is to enlist private capital. Its distinct aim and purpose, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], by the chairman of the committee and nominal author of the bill, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], and by the ranking minority leader of the committee, my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], is to enlist private capital to accept water-power grants and leases, to build the water-power dams and accessory works, and to develop, transmit, use, and sell electricity thereby generated.

The purpose of this bill is to establish ownership, exploitation, and operation of the great water-power resources of this Nation by private capital. Therefore, most consistently does the gentleman from Alabama further along in his speech state:

> My only fear is that it—the bill—does not hold out sufficient inducements to capital to encourage investment in such enterprises.

Has not the committee spread upon the records of this House pages of statistics to show how difficult it is to interest private capital in water-power projects?

Do you not recall how the committee has investigated and found a list of 56 financial corporations, American and European, all of whose names and addresses the committee has ascertained and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, who were so shy of hydroelectrical projects that they refused to consider the financing of the Keokuk Dam?

Has not the chairman of the committee, author of the bill, also dug up the history of 16 hydroelectric corporations, representing 506,000 horsepower, which have been through receiverships or proved bad investments?

In his opening speech the author of this bill frankly told us that the purpose of this bill was "to tempt capital" to construct and operate these dams; and he bemoaned the fact that "capital is a wary old bird."

Finally, on page 12527 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he states in open confidence to the public and this House:

> If this bill were allowed to pass and permit the utilization of private capital to relieve the Treasury of all these expenses, why perhaps if we could make the proposition sufficiently attractive to capital, and they could open up all this navigation and at the same time furnish the people light and the cleanest, best, and cheapest fuel, electric force enough to manufacture not only fertilizers, but every other conceivable thing that the genius of this country could think of, and make a network of trolley lines all over that fair country.

The committee in its testimony and report, its chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, its ranking minority member, my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], as well as the gentleman from Alabama, majority House leader, have all discussed the various measures of this bill with reference to its effect in inviting private capital, in promoting private investment, and enlisting the interest of promoters and investors in the private ownership and operation of the hydroelectric developments of this country through the instrumentality of this bill. They have told us that "the hazards of hydroelectric investment are greater than in any other class of investments"; and so, as so consistently stated by the leader of the House majority, the gentleman from Alabama, in his summing up of the vital considerations affecting the bill's purpose and mission after passage, the great concern of its authors and supporters is "My only fear is that it does not hold out sufficient inducements to capital to encourage investment in such enterprises."

Let us, therefore, start upon this discussion with this one proposition as an established corner stone, namely, that the purpose of the bill is private investment and private operation of hydroelectric utilities. That is the central point upon which rests the whole argument of the bill's supporters.

Let us now see where this established proposition leads us. This bill provides private ownership and operation of hydroelectric developments under an irrevocable contract for a period of 50 years. We are to have such private operation of our great water-power resources for at least a half century from the day of the passage of the bill. By that time perhaps every member of this Congress will be dead and gone, and the vast majority of the adult population of the United States interested to-day in the industries and commerce of America.

Bear this in mind, there can be no recapture by the Government, except for violation of contract, for a half century to come. What, then, becomes of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama that "recapture of the dam and its accessory works" is the "most important feature of the bill"?

Is this House legislating for the public only of that remote period a half century hence, when recapture first becomes possible? Have we no duties to the 100,000,000 people of America to-day and for 50 years to come?

Moreover—and this proposition, while true, makes the situation worse—the gentleman from Alabama demonstrates that this private hydroelectric development and exploitation is in its nature a "monopoly." To use his language again, "hydroelectric developments and public-service companies are found natural monopolies performing a public-utility service." A page of noted authorities, including leading economists, public officials, and two former Presidents, are thereupon quoted for the space of a full page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD "supporting the contention that hydroelectric developments are natural monopolies." The learned gentleman finally leads up to the conclusion that—

> Combination is as natural in business as it is in human society. Only among primitive peoples is every man a law unto himself and an enemy to his neighbor. Combination was the first step toward civilization and is a force which will persist while civilization continues.

Accepting these two propositions as settled, therefore, first, that the prime object of this bill is to enlist private capital in hydroelectric development, and second, that such hydroelectric development is a natural monopoly, what, therefore, becomes the paramount duty of Congress in the premises? Is it not to make certain that this bill provides for a thoroughgoing system of public regulation of hydroelectric utilities? Is not such public regulation, which should be established now and to be continuously in force during the 50-year life of every one of these valuable public water-power grants, the paramount concern of the American people of to-day, rather than a recapture clause which is to be effective a half century hence?

As against the fear of the gentleman from Alabama and other sponsors of this bill, lest "it does not hold out sufficient inducements to capital to encourage investments," my fear and concern is, lest the bill does not provide a system of public regulation that will properly safeguard the public interests of the American people during the 50 years before recapture is possible. Moreover, I am as certain as I ever was upon any proposition which I have ever investigated and studied during my professional and public career that this bill does not provide anything worthy of the name of a system of public regulation. I challenge any sponsor of this bill to point to the public-utility law of any of the 30 States that to-day attempt public-utility regulation, that is not a better law with much stronger and better-defined provisions for public regulation than the feeble attempt at hydroelectric regulation made in section 11, the public-regulation section of this bill.

Moreover, such regulation, as is hinted at in section 11, is largely offset by sections 9, 13, and 15, which, respectively, accomplish the following obstacles to public regulations: First, a flat 50-year water-power franchise, without option of the Government to modify the period of the grant; second, a vested right which Congress has no authority to amend or repeal, except for violation of terms; and, third, immunity from the provisions of the antitrust laws in allowing a group of grantees to "assist one another whenever necessary." Coupled with absence of anything like express powers to be exercised by the Government to publicly regulate these "natural monopolies" owned and operated by private capital, we find, therefore, that the bill actually handicaps and holds the hand of the administrative branch of Government in its possible future efforts to protect the public from aggrandizement of hydroelectric monopoly.

INDUCEMENTS OF THE BILL TO PRIVATE CAPITAL.

The gentleman from Alabama fears that the bill does not offer sufficient inducements to private capital. Let me, therefore call the attention of this House to some of the special inducements offered. On this point, I think that the author of the bill, the gentleman from Georgia, is good authority when he said:

The committee offers a bill that it is believed will invite and attract capital to construct dams in the navigable streams of the country, improving the navigation of these streams, and developing water power at the same time.

I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, after careful examination of this bill and its many attractive features, that when the gentleman from Georgia said, "The committee offers a bill that it is believed will invite and attract capital," he was familiar with the facts and the personnel of hydroelectric investment; in short, that he knew what he was talking about.

Here is a partial list of some of the inducements, the investment plums, as it were, of this bill:

First. A flat 50-year grant, at least—it may work out much longer—is given to every grantee of Federal water power, with no option of the Government to modify the term; while in many of our States, as well as other progressive countries, where hydroelectric development is most successful, the grant runs for periods of 20 to 40 years and present acts give the Government a leeway of option under the phrase "No longer than 50 years."

Second. Section 13 makes this grant or lease a vested right, without the usual reservation of Congress to alter or repeal, unless the contract itself is violated; and, therefore, the United States becomes liable for "alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners, or any other persons interested in such dam."

Third. Section 15 gives the grantee the following immunity bath from the provisions of the antitrust laws:

Provided, however, That it shall be lawful, under the approval of the Secretary of War, for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary, by supplementing the currents or power, and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers.

What more complete immunity could a hydroelectric group, like the General Electric, which controls 50 per cent of the available water power of 18 States, ask for to maintain its electric trust combination?

Fourth. Although it is provided that, "In no case shall such an arrangement be permitted to raise the price," there is no prohibition against such a group maintaining an arrangement to resist the reduction of price.

Fifth. There is no requirement upon the hydroelectric "monopoly," as it is admitted to be, to file with the public a report of its operations or proceedings, a statement of costs of plant, production, transmission, use, or sale, or to keep public accounts of its finances subject to public examination; and there is no authority for the Government to visit the works, have access to its accounts, or compel the attendance of witnesses with books and records.

Sixth. There is no procedure provided for public appeal against service or rates and no system outlined for standards of service or procedure to establish a basis for ascertaining and fixing just charges, or for publicity of rates, accounts, proceedings, complaints, or finances.

Seventh. There is no basis established for Federal and State cooperation in hydroelectric utility regulation to prevent a "twilight zone" of jurisdiction in which neither the Federal Government or the State can act with certitude and effective result. Federal interposition is established in this bill, so as to exclude in large measure the power of the State and the municipalities to protect themselves against these Federal grantees and lessees; but this bill gives the consuming public no certain and assured regulation and protection against bad service and rate extortion in its stead.

Therefore, it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that this bill offers many inducements to capital of the hydroelectric group order not found elsewhere and not enjoyed by other kinds of corporations of the "monopoly" family in this country. Certainly I feel that the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee was well within the facts when he declared: "The committee offers a bill that it is believed will invite capital."

Surely the committee had an opportunity to know its ground, because the only witnesses which, according to the published testimony, testified before the committee were hydroelectric promoters and financiers. Had the committee summoned to its presence the experienced public officials of something like 20 to 30 public-service commissions who are regulating such utilities under State laws, the committee would have learned the necessity of strict regulation of hydroelectric monopolies and imbibed something of the system and spirit of such public regulation. it is fair to believe, instead of simply the fear that the inducements to such interests might be insufficient.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman think of the value of the right to recapture, in that it would give to the Government the opportunity at the time of recapture to revamp rules under which the monopoly was authorized to exist?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois I believe, as I stated before, that while recapture may be necessary, I do not think that it is essential to a bill which relies upon private operation. I think that the material proposition here from this time on is to provide suitable public regulation. I believe that the committee has brought into the House a bill that gives capital more than it should have. I do not agree with the gentleman from Alabama when he said in his remarks the other day that he is fearful that capital will not take advantage of this measure if it is passed just as it was brought in.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that the field of electricity is so new that it is always dangerous to give too long a period upon a fixed basis, because of the remarkable improvements that may be made by science that will ultimately make it very inexpensive? If you do not have control over it, future reduction in price to the public may not result. Is not that one of the arguments why the Government should not grant too much freedom and latitude here?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. In what respect? Now, there are several respects in which the Government can grant latitude. Now, in what particular one?

Mr. FESS. The Government ought not to lose the power to name the regulatory function as to charges, for example, simply because the cost charge now might be very much lessened later on by invention or by discovery. In other words, is not a long time contract, where electrical appliances are involved, rather a serious thing to grant?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It is unless you couple that up with strict, efficient public regulation.

Mr. FESS. That is the point I am trying to get at, that the public ought to hold that power.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. And unless you hold that power the public is apt to suffer, and if you do hold the power the investor should not suffer, because the American people are fair and they do not want capital to work for them without yielding to capital a just compensation. But capital, on the other hand, as we know, has often been unfair and exacted a tribute from the public which it should not have exacted. It is for us as Members of Congress engaged in the forming and shaping of a piece of legislation the like of which has not passed out of this House this session, and I doubt whether it will in some sessions to come, to look out for this, because this deals with a project that is simply in its infancy. And as we look into the future we see how important it becomes. We have had our experience in the past in dealing with natural resources. We know how capital has foreseen the future and taken advantage of it. We also know that the American people have slept on their rights and have permitted capital to go out and gather up the natural resources of this country and bring them to their own vaults.

It is time that we should be looking out for the things that are plain and easy to be seen, and one of the things that is plain in this proposition is the fact that the manufacture of hydroelectricity is becoming one of the great industries of this country, and it is just in its infancy, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has said. Then why should we start out at this time, after many years of hard labor and study by our committees, with a half-baked proposition that does not give any protection to the public?

Section 15 of this bill provides:

That it shall be lawful under the approval of the Secretary of War for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary, by supplementing the currents or power, and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers.

Gentlemen, if that section means anything, it means a permission on the part of the Government that hydroelectric corporations may combine and assist each other when it becomes convenient for them to do so. It means that they may come to each other's assistance whenever business stress requires it. It means, if it means anything, that the State laws against trusts and the national laws against trusts are put aside and that these institutions are to be immune from the operations of our antitrust laws.

Some gentlemen may contend that that does not clearly appear. I claim it is so clear that a man who desires to see it may see it. It is, at least, dangerous, and if it be in that condition, is it not wise to remedy it? Let us, if we are going to have regulated monopoly, say how far this monopoly may go and how far it may not go. Let us have some control over it that will amount to a supervision and not a mere makeshift.

Section 14 has to do with dams known as public dams built out of the public purse of the Government. Under this section it is possible that a municipality or a State, wishing to obtain the privilege of using the power generated by one of these public dams, may have to go into the open market and bid for the privilege.

And in my own State could not the electric company which has a practical monopoly of all the electric power of that section afford to pay five times what that project is worth for the purpose of killing a competitor? They contend that we have not the right as a State or as a Nation to start an institution which will be a competitor of theirs; that they have invested their capital, and they have a right now to the market which that capital supplies. We have a right to preserve our natural resources, and one of the resources of that community is the water that flows down the Mississippi River and over this dam. That is not owned by any individual. It is the property of the State, and is controlled by the Federal Government. We should have the right, and the first right, to obtain the privilege of using the surplus water that flows over that dam. And any bill which passes this House should protect us in that right, and not put us in a position where we will have to compete with public-service corporations in order to get it. The National Government has not any right to ask any more than a return of the money or a fair return on the capital that it has invested. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama when he says it would not be wise, even though we have a right to tax the people of that community for the use of that water, to do it, because every dollar of tax you impose upon the dam and upon the grantee of the dam is transferred to the people who use it. Who has built up that market and every other market? It is the people of the community that the electric plant supplies.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AS A REGULATOR.

Another point which has not yet been brought out in this debate is the value of an occasional water-power project under public ownership and operation as a regulator of rates and charges. We do this in the case of transportation rates by providing for water transportation under Federal waterway projects. Indeed, the chief advantage of water transportation, and the principal justification cited by the Chief of United States Engineers and his colleagues of the Engineering Corps for a given waterway project or improvement, is its effect in reducing transportation rates, and in particular the rates of competing railways.

Thus, as a regulator of rates the Soo Canal and the Great Lakes project are estimated by Government engineers as worth scores of millions of dollars annually in reduction of rates, both by water and rail. Even the Mississippi, upon which comparatively little commerce moves, is recognized by the Government engineers as reducing the competitive rail rates between the Twin Cities and St. Louis something like 20 per cent. The Monongahela is known to have a marked effect in reducing coal rates.

Just such a result could be achieved by an occasional water-power project owned and operated by a public body, whether Federal, State, or municipal. The entire business would in that case be under direct public control, and the public would know the actual cost of production, transmission, and delivery of electric current and be in a position to know absolutely whether given rates and service by private companies were just or not.

Suppose, for an illustration, the public corporation created by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota for the purpose, a corporation created by public act and supported by public funds, in which the State university and the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis are the active and interested public functionaries, should be allowed to secure, under the provisions of this bill, the lease of the 30-foot-high dam which the Government is now building across the Mississippi River between the two cities. Here would be a Federal dam and water power operated for a public purpose, the furnishing of light and power to local public institutions. All the facts of operation would be public property. The public would have complete public information as to methods and all data. The work would be an open book. Would there not be a great public gain, not only to the people of Minnesota but to the country at large, in the trial of this hydroelectric experiment?

In Minnesota the Consumers' Power Co. of Chicago, a foreign corporation, has almost a complete monopoly of public lighting and power in the big cities of the central and southern sections of the State and over a large suburban territory. Rates by this company are charged at prices varying from 10 cents down to 2 cents per kilowatt hour. Public charges of discrimination and extortion are common. Litigation is perennial. The elections are affected by the issues raised. Suspicions are general in certain political quarters against any public man who is on friendly terms with the so-called public utilities.

If this high-dam project of the Government could be leased to the State public corporation to meet public municipal and institutional needs and placed exclusively under public operation and control, Minnesota would be a public regulator of electric light and power rates, and the public would know whether the rates charged by the private corporation are just or discriminatory.

I have no doubt, moreover, so far as personal and official disposition is concerned, that the Secretary of War would gladly see such an experiment tried and give the public institution a lease. But to do so he needs congressional authority. In order to give the required authority with anything like certainty of result, just one thing is necessary, and that is, to provide, as the Provinces of Canada and the leading States of Germany provide, for priority of public use over commercial use. That is the only certain way; because otherwise the private corporation is situated so as to give the Secretary of War superior commercial terms in order to insure its monopoly.

The Consumers' Power Co. of Chicago could afford to offer many times what that power is worth simply to prevent the public body from instituting a rate regulator of electric prices in the State of Minnesota. From a business point of view the commercial company would be able to name terms to the administrative branch of Government which no business official who was jealous of public income and expenditure ought to turn down, unless that official had the backing of Congress in the shape of a clause in this water-power act giving preference to the application of the public claimant over the commercial corporation who applied for power for sale and exchange. Thus all progressive nations which have enacted up-to-date water-power acts in recent years have provided for such emergency a priority of public purpose clause which give preference to applications for public use and purpose over all private claims.

DIRECT USE BY INDUSTRIES.

The gentlemen from Georgia and Alabama are interested, as many other public-spirited citizens of this country are, in the use of electric current from Federal water powers for the development of fertilizer and electric steel industries. There is no question that such developments are fraught with great value to the future industrial development, not only of the South, but of the North and West and wherever there is a large surplus water power.

The practical question is, How shall these industries secure the economical use of these water powers? Does the gentleman from Alabama think for a moment that these industries will prosper and secure low electric costs, if a middle-man in the shape of a public-service corporation is instituted and placed between the Federal grantor and the industry which uses the power? What service will that middle-man afford? Its mission is to earn dividends and interest on its own watered securities and pay salaries to a body of favored directors, experts, and officials. If that fertilizer or electric steel industry wants cheap power there is just one way to get it, and that is to deal directly with the Government instead of with the corporate middleman. If that industry wants to be able to compete successfully with similar industries in Norway and Sweden it can not begin by paying dividends and high salaries to American public-service corporations. It must get its hydroelectric current direct without special tribute along the way.

What is the practical application? It is this again, that this bill must have a properly worded priority of purpose section, giving an industry priority over a public-service corporation in contesting applications for leases. Otherwise the hydroelectric combinations, with their special grant of immunities, will secure control over all the choice water powers of America, and neither an American industry nor an American municipality will have an opportunity to secure a public water power except through a commercial middle-man in the form of a public-service monopoly.

The people of Minneapolis and of St. Paul have built up the market for this great hydroelectric plant supply. Dam after dam in the Mississippi River above Minneapolis is being built, or will be built, and not a cent is being asked for it. There should not be a cent asked for it, except that when the Government gives a private individual the right to a monopoly, or the use of that power which belongs to the State, then we demand that there should be such a regulation of the rates and of the service as will do justice to our community.

Now, I suggest in all candor and in all sincerity that the people of Massachusetts are not entitled to one whit more than the people of Minnesota; that it should be our effort from the time we enter this Hall until we leave it to see that our part of this country receives fair treatment and that no part of it receives any special favor. We are not asking any special favors when we lay down a general rule that any community can adopt; and I am going to call the attention of the House to a bill that I introduced, possibly not with any hope of its being adopted, but in which there are certain sections that I consider should be adopted in the committee bill. One of them is as follows:

As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder, the commission shall have due regard to the use and purpose for which such permit is required, priority of purpose and of benefits conferred by such permit and project to rank in the following order:

First. Benefits to navigation and conservation of water resources.

Second. Public uses of the States, the municipal subdivisions thereof, and public institutions.

Third. Industrial use for agricultural, mining, and manufacturing industries.

Fourth. Commercial power for sale, barter, and exchange, and for use by public-service corporations.

Some such provision as section 3, the priority of purpose chapter of my own measure (H. R. 17854), I respectfully submit, is radically necessary for the protection of the public interest under the operations of the pending bill (H. R. 16053). Let me again call the attention of the Members of this House to the fact that with few and perhaps no exceptions, the well-known water-power laws of all other progressive nations enacted in recent times provide for priority of public use and purpose by most carefully worded express provisions. Certainly the United States of America, in Congress assembled to consider the conservation and wise development of its water powers, will not neglect its duty in this regard, and offer to the world a reactionary measure which ignores the public interest in its own water-power resources.

What does the pending measure recognize in this regard? As stated by the authors and sponsors of the bill, it has one prime purpose and that is to attract and interest private capital. It places commercial use and purpose first and foremost. It is true that in section 14, which pertains to leases of dams built by the Government, preference is given to the lessee who is able to conserve navigation and the water-power development. But, of course, that goes without saying, because the source of all Federal control flows out of the constitutional authority of Congress over navigation. What other public interest, however, does H. R. 16053 recognize and protect? It does not recognize or give priority to either Federal or State use. It gives no recognition to municipal use. It recognizes no public institution as an applicant for a water-power lease. It is primarily only the fourth and last purpose and use named in section 3 of my bill that H. R. 16053 fully contemplates and recognizes, namely, "Commercial power for sale, barter, and exchange, and for use by public-service corporations." In other words, what Canada, Germany, and Switzerland hold of last consideration from the point of priority of use and purpose this bill places first; and the gentleman from Alabama, indeed, even then confesses "my only fear is that it—the bill—does not hold out sufficient inducements to capital."

House bill 16053 permits private capital to come into our community and into your community and bid against the citizens of that community who have natural rights there, and under this bill the commercial interest may pay five times what the actual price of that surplus water is worth and to surcharge every man, woman, and child in that community for that overcharge. It is admitted on all hands that hydroelectric development is a natural monopoly. It is so admitted by the authors of this bill, and no one seriously contends that it is not. So let us frame the bill so that every community that can bring itself within the provisions of this law can obtain the surplus water that flows by its shore and past its door, and in that way you will give no special privilege to anyone. I commend, therefore, particularly to the consideration of those who are seriously interested in this proposition section 3 of House bill 17854. I also commend to their attention section 16 of the same bill, which provides for regulation.

Now, so much for section 14. I have not the time to dwell longer upon it, but I do contend that it can be greatly improved upon. I do not contend but that under House bill 16053 the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul could get the right to use that power. However, I believe that if you incorporate into such a law the section I have called attention to, the cities and the States would have the first opportunity of refusing to lease such power, and the cities of other States would have the same opportunity. That seems to be fair and wise.

Section 11 provides for the regulation of the sale and use of the hydroelectric power that will be developed by these dams, and this regulation is turned over to the Secretary of War. What does he know about industry, commerce, and navigation? What has the Secretary of War or the War Department ever done toward the development of industry or commerce? Over $500,000,000 has been expended on the rivers of this Nation by the Federal Government under the direction of the War Department. Over $160,000,000 has been expended on the Mississippi River alone.

What commerce and industry have been built up by the War Department from such expenditure? It has opened the way for commerce and industry to follow at such time as the United States shall wake up to the need of a national system of waterway administration under right control. But the engineers of the War Department are not trained to look after industry and commerce. They are men of war, and not of peace. They are men highly trained as engineers, who know all about the engineering proposition, who can examine and pass upon a set of specifications, and can superintend the construction of a dam. But when it comes to the regulation of industry and commerce, to the operation of hydroelectric business, establishing commercial rates and standards of service and dealing with producers and consumers, or figuring what rate you and I should pay for our electric current, it is outside of their field entirely. There are other departments of our Government that are peculiarly adapted to that sort of business, and therefore I have proposed, in this amended bill that I have offered, that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Commerce shall constitute a water-power commission to control and regulate the hydroelectric business of the country. We have got to come to that proposition. You may shift along for a little time under the Secretary of War's supervision, but he will tell you, or his engineers will tell you, that they know nothing about hydroelectric service, accounts, reports, operation, or rates. They have no means at their command by which they can ascertain scientific standards of hydroelectric service, prescribe commercial accounts and reports, regulate industry and commerce, or how to place a suitable rate. They have no means under their control by which they can tell what would be a suitable service. But have we not in the Department of Commerce just that sort of machinery? We have our Bureau of Corporations. We have our Bureau of Standards. We have our Bureau of Navigation.

My idea is that if a water-power commission of the kind suggested should be created, we could build up a system that would be wholesome and beneficial. When you undertake to delegate to one man, without the right of appeal, the vast interests which are involved in this sort of legislation, you are doing something which you know is wrong. Your own sense of right and justice and your own knowledge of the capacity of men tells you that it is wrong. Moreover, the duties involved in the granting of water-power leases, the adjustment of public complaints in regard to rates and service, and the general enforcement of the regulations of this bill, are not only executive, they are quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial, as are the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to railway regulation; and a board of three is, for such functions, much more efficient, and far more likely to receive public support, than a one-man tribunal even if he be so exalted as the Secretary of War.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, if you make a board constituted of representatives from these three different departments, is there not danger that you will lack in unity of decision by conflicting interests in all the departments represented? Do you not think a single department of the Government would be better than a board of three departments?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. No; I do not. I grant that a single department, outside of all existing departments, would possibly be better for the enforcement of the purely executive provisions of the act; but, in the first place, we are not now prepared to create a new waterway and water-power cabinet department, and, in the second place, it must be admitted that quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions such as are herein required are better performed by a commission or bench of three men than by one-man decision and rule. Furthermore, I think it is up to us as legislators to try and find some way by which we can economize to a certain extent. It is for the sake of economy as well as efficiency that I suggest the above plan as one ready at hand to be put into immediate effective execution with the minimum of cost and the maximum of departmental efficiency. In the War Department you have only the Corps of Engineers, while in the Interior Department you have your Bureau of Water Resources, you have your Topographical Survey, and you have one other department. In the Department of Commerce you have nine bureaus, and every one of them could be brought into cooperation, so that they would bear on the regulation of hydroelectric development, use, and so forth. There would not be a waste anywhere. There would not be a duplication anywhere. If the Secretary of War is going to undertake the regulation of hydroelectric development of this country, its sale and its use, he must create a department for it, and I say if you will take on these other departments with the departments that you now have in the Government you have sufficient machinery to enable you to carry on wisely and intelligently, perhaps not the best scheme that could be possibly proposed, but a scheme that has practical merit and far superior to the scheme that is presented in H. R. 16053 from every point of view.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Most assuredly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman desire to take from the Secretary of War and the Corps of Engineers the work of river and harbor improvements?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Not at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, perhaps, the gentleman has failed to discover the scheme of this bill. I will yield to the gentleman any time I consume.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. All right.

Mr. ADAMSON. We placed this matter in the hands of the Secretary of War, because it is a navigation project. It is not designed that a single dam shall ever be built except in aid of navigation under the provisions of this bill. As the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers have charge of river and harbor work, and this is river and harbor work, it goes under the same jurisdiction, to be supervised in the same way. It is so difficult to secure from Congress appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and there are so many thousands of miles of shallow steams that could be made navigable, we have been trying for 15 years to induce private capital to relieve the Government of this expense, and as the Secretary of War has charge of river and harbor work we placed conditions on consent of Congress to erect by private capital a dam in a navigable stream. Those conditions are mainly two. The gentleman has already discussed the 50-year limit. There are mainly two, aside from that. One is, they must do enough work, in the estimation of the Secretary of War, to promote navigation at that place. That secures what the Government wants. Then they must submit to regulation in the interest of the people, in order that the rates and practices may be fair. Those are the two main things.

As to the recapture, this bill makes the most perfect provision for that that has ever been devised by human ingenuity. We give two or three ways by which the Government holds control of it, and disposes of it at the end of 50 years in any way it desires to do so.

As to regulation, this bill, if the genfleman reads the entire section, provides perfectly for the regulation of rates and service, for the entire protection of the Government, the protection of the public, and promotion of navigation. Now, I know the gentleman wants to be fair. As to the wire connection, the section is entirely contrary to what the gentleman has stated, and if the gentleman will read it carefully and put it in his speech it will so appear. It denounces monopoly and does not say "a combination of wire," but it says "a connection of wire," so that when one river is low and another is high they may supply the shortage for one another, just as a merchant may supply goods to another or banks may pay checks to one another. It is as free from any possible monopoly as an angel is free from sin.

As to regulation, it is substantially identical with the regulation in the bill that the gentleman commends. If the State will not do its duty, the Secretary of War can enforce conditions and put the regulations on it. As to whether he is the right man or not may be questioned, but we fix it there because he has charge of navigation projects. It depends on who the man is that you get for Secretary of War, and if you had a board it would be made up of mortal men and as liable to err as the Secretary of War. Now, I beg the gentleman's pardon for the interruption. I recognize his fairness, and I know that he wants the best bill possible.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia thoroughly misapprehends the entire purpose of my argument, if he for a moment believes that I favor taking away from the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers any of those engineering functions which they have traditionally performed throughout American history. What I object to is not that the engineering functions but that the regulation of hydroelectric industry and commerce should be exercised by the War Department.

Apparently the gentleman has forgotten the distinctive feature of his own bill. It is not dam construction, it is hydroelectric regulation. By rights the gentleman should have added to the title of his bill the line, "and for the regulation of the development, transmission, use, and sale of hydroelectric power." It is this commercial, industrial, and financial feature of the bill, with which the gentleman says that he is trying "to bait capital," that distinguishes it from former acts; and I maintain, and I believe the Members of this House feel, that such a function is foreign to the Department of War.

I have retained in my bill—H. R. 17854—the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers for all engineering functions which they now perform, and also made the Secretary of War a member of the water-power commission, which exercises the quasi-legislative and judicial duties of the commission. But I submit that a commission to regulate industry and commerce should be composed of something more than a War Secretary; and I have therefore consolidated the official machinery of the Departments of Commerce, Interior, and War in order to cover the whole ground of a thoroughly equipped board of commerce, industry, and navigation.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, in reply, that I realize that all men are mortal and subject to shortcomings. But under my plan we would have three chances, and therefore I would prefer that. I realize that all men are subject to shortcomings somewhere along the line. I have not found a perfect man yet, and therefore I believe it would be wiser to have a board. I believe we could not afford to enact a law and say we have given it our best thought and best judgment when it only contains a single arbiter to pass upon such a vast amount of business and such delicate propositions as are contained in this project and no particular method provided. All you have to do under this bill is to bring the Secretary of War out, take lunch with him, and talk the situation over. Let us have public hearings. Let us not have a closed parlor session.

Now, let me read this section of the bill that provides for such regulation:

Provided, That whenever the State in which such current shall be used shall have provided by law adequate regulation for rates, charges, and service to the consumers for such electric current and such regulation shall not be unduly discriminatory or unjust against the service or charges in any other State arising from the use of the power from the same project, and such facts shall be established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War—

And so forth.

Why, gentlemen, under this provision you place in the hands of the Secretary of War the power to pass upon every public utility commission in the United States. Not only does he pass upon it, but upon its fairness and adequacy. You also enable him to say whether your State is acting fairly. There is no limit to the power which you have placed in his hands when it comes to what the Secretary of War can do in order to protect the investor, but you have not provided any rules or regulations or specifications which will tell the Secretary of War or any other board which is to pass on the question what they ought to do when the consumer is aggrieved.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that the gentleman from Minnesota refers to another bill. I want to call his attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior has to fix the rates in that bill, and he is a mortal man, too.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I have not said that I agreed in all respects with that bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. He may be the right man now, but when the next man comes along he may not be.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The Secretary of the Interior is more competent to pass upon the public-domain resources and proper public service than is the Secretary of War, because the Secretary of the Interior has under his control instrumentalities which would give him the knowledge to provide for conservation of the public interests and make a fair and proper determination. The Secretary of War has nobody but the engineers who can tell about the construction of the dam, the water flow, and engineering questions.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman wish to impugn the intelligence, capacity, and ability of the Corps of Engineers?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. In their special line, I claim that we have a Corps of Engineers that is superior to any corps of engineers in all the world.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is not this exactly in their line?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. No; it is not, and my colleague knows that it is not.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I know that the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken, after an experience of 15 years in that very kind of work and on the very dam he has been speaking about.

The gentleman has been making a lot of misstatements here this afternoon, and this is one of them, and this matter should not go abroad in remarks of this kind.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in reply to my colleague that in this discussion I have tried to be fair, and I am going to be. I am going to proceed along the line that any gentleman should follow in debate in the House, no matter what course my colleague may adopt. I can realize that my colleague may be sincere. Because for 15 years he has been the intimate associate of the Engineering Department of this Government, and has swapped favors with that department to such an extent that he would not be human unless he would be prejudiced in their favor, I wish to say that I am not criticizing anybody, I am not impugning his motives, but I do say that I believe his associations with this body of engineers has made him believe they are capable of performing the impossible. I am only willing to admit that they are human, and capable only of performing things which the average man would perform; and when you come to give them work of a peculiar nature, of which they have no knowledge or experience, then I say that they are outside of their province and they are no better than any other class of men.

Moreover, the 15 years of work which my colleague states that he has been performing in connection with the Corps of Engineers was not the regulation of hydroelectric utilities. That function has never yet been attempted by the Secretary of War nor by any other public department in this country, except only the public-utility commissions of the States. Our Corps of Engineers have superintended the construction of dams, but they have no experience in the regulation of commerce and industry. They have no experience with the regulation of the hydroelectric industries, which in 1912, according to the Census Bureau, of the Department of Commerce, earned over $300,000,000—the very industries, Mr. Chairman, which the Bureau of Corporations, also of the Commerce Department, finds have been so largely combined into great hydroelectric "interrelationships" or "groups," popularly known as trusts, and which the authors of this bill are compelled to admit are "natural monopolies."

When, may I ask, has the Secretary of War exercised the public duty of regulating "monopoly"—the duty which the authors of this bill would place upon him? When have the Corps of Engineers been engaged in supervising the commercial operations of the hydroelectric utilities? What record is that which the gentleman says I would impugn? That record has never yet been attempted by any department of our Government. We are now planning such regulation for the first time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does it not stand to reason that the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior, or any other tribunal constituted by law, when a complaint of this sort came up would hear the evidence and exercise judgment and common sense on what the facts and the testimony appeared to be?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it has been my experience that it is always wise to protect your public servants. I am just as anxious to protect the Secretary of War from the unwise position that he is taking here as I am to protect my respected friend, the chairman of this committee. I know that he would protect me if he saw me attempting to commit a folly. The Secretary of War is going to have hearings only when he feels like it. He is to be the sole arbiter as to that. I say, pass a bill here that will permit the public when they are aggrieved to come before whatever body has control of this hydroelectric proposition and file their petitions and have a public hearing and a record made. Is there anything in this bill that permits any such thing? Is there anything in this bill that sets out anything like a form to be followed? Why do you not simply elect your judges and tell them to proceed without either law or procedure?

The gentleman knows, as a practitioner of long experience at the bar of his State, that one of the things that protects the rights of citizens is the mode of procedure and the practice of the court. Many a man is not known to be an able lawyer upon the substantive propositions of law, but when it comes down to a matter of practice and procedure he knows how to present the rights of his clients to the proper tribunal, and I say that there is no method provided in this bill for the presentation of the rights of the public to the tribunal, notwithstanding you have a tribunal that consists of only one man.

I wonder if the honorable gentleman whose name stands as author of this bill, or the committee in which the bill was cradled and fostered, has taken the trouble in the course of its study of this question to examine the provisions of the public utility laws of the 20 or 30 States who have undertaken the regulation of public utilities such as this bill proposes to regulate? If so, the honorable gentleman has found a most elaborate system and procedure carefully worked out down to the last detail of accounting, public reports, published tariffs, standardized service, tests of service, procedure for public complaints as to rates and service, public hearings and adjudications of grievances, appeals and rehearings, basis of returns to capital, basis of valuation for rate making, relations of public utility to consumer and to investor, and, in short, a well-rounded system of industrial and commercial regulation, for the protection alike of capital and the public consumer—none of which, Mr. Chairman, this bill makes more than a feeble and uncertain pretense of putting into law.

And yet the distinctive feature of this bill is regulation, and the regulation of the most difficult and complex brood of "natural monopolies" which exist and are rapidly multiplying in our fair land. I do not object to their existence or to their multiplication; but I do insist that when we turn over to them the great water-power resources of the American people we should do it under public regulations that are real, tangible, definite, adequate, efficient, and worthy of the best efforts of this Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman wish more time?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. So far as my immediate State is concerned, I do not anticipate any Federal tribunal will have any trouble with them. My State has provision and regulation of all of these matters, but inasmuch as there are some States I understand that have not, and inasmuch as some people have fears about making regulations, we provided wisely, we thought, that the Federal Government should retain that control.

If it should be demonstrated by experience that we can devise a better tribunal to pass upon these matters, Congress is here always ready to do it. We want to get through something that will enable us to begin the construction of dams, and it is not necessary to advise my friend from Minnesota of the difference between this and the public-lands proposition. Out there there is the land. The Government owns the land, and in many places owns the beds of the streams where it has not parted with the land. This is an entirely different proposition. Ours is where we have nothing but the power to consent or refuse to allow somebody to construct a dam, and we must make arrangements and trades that will induce capital to put money into the construction of a dam, and up to this time we have not been able to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I disagree to a certain extent to what the gentleman from Georgia says.

I realize that in certain cases, such as the Coosa, at No. 18, I think it is, that it may be possible that the Government will have to erect the dam. Why did we go to Alaska to build a railroad? Because private capital wanted more than we thought they ought to have and we went there to preserve and protect the natural resources. The water resources of the country can be treated in the same way.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have been hammering at the doors of Congress for 30 years to improve the Coosa River and they will not do it. We could get private capital to improve the best stream in the United States and give 900 miles of navigation through the best and most prosperous people in the world if we chose to make fair terms with private capital to put up these dams and save the Government $30,000,0000 or $40,000,000 if we were going to do it at all.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. My proposition is, we must not give away the rights of the people in doing that.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not; there is not a word, not a line, not a syllable or a letter in this bill that gives away any right of the Government or the people; not a line, and has not been.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Well, that is a matter of opinion——

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir; it is a matter of fact. If the gentleman will get out of his head the old folderol that has misled people and filled the yellow journals for 15 years, he and they would understand this is a different proposition; that the Government does not own and has no right in anything but the matter of navigation.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I would like to ask the Chairman who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor, and he yielded to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield the gentleman all the time I consume, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am glad of these interruptions. I know the gentleman is honest about these things and honest in thrashing it out, and that is why I am giving to this subject my best thought. I have studied this matter somewhat, and I do not feel that I am going off at a tangent in asking simply one thing in reference to this proposition, and that is efficient public regulation. Now, I feel we have gone as far with this bill as we could go in enticing capital to invest in this enterprise, and I do not believe we should surrender the natural resources of this country, boots and breeches, over to capital without having some strings to them, and one of the strings you can have is efficient public regulation.

In brief, Mr. Chairman, I believe this House could well profit by a study of the message of former Gov. Hughes, of New York, now Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who in his message of January 2, 1907, one of the first messages to the American people on the subject of the conservation of the public hydroelectric resources said:

> In this connection it is well to consider the great value of the undeveloped water powers thus placed under State control. They should be preserved and held for the benefit of all the people and should not be surrendered to private interests. It would be difficult to exaggerate the advantages which may ultimately accrue from these great resources of power if the common right is duly safeguarded.

And again:

> The entire question of the relation of the State to its waters demands more careful attention than it has hitherto received in order that there may be an adequate scheme of just regulation for the public benefit.

Mr. Chairman, I herewith respectfully commend these words of wisdom, emanating from the mind of one of the greatest of American publicists and jurists, to all those ambitious statesmen of this House who fear lest insufficient inducement to private interest may not have been granted in this bill, or who hold that the prime object and concern of Congress in water-power legislation should be to enact provisions that will be as attractive as possible to private capital. Mr. Chairman, our paramount duty as representatives of the people is to protect the public interest and to make certain that no grants of the public resources shall go from our hands without strict scrutiny and public regulation.

NECESSITY FOR WATER-POWER COMMISSION.

The undeveloped water powers of the United States are variously estimated at from 30,000,000 horsepower to 60,000,000 horsepower. The total horsepower used to-day in all kinds of manufacturing establishments is not to exceed 30,000,000, and only 7,000,000 horsepower of this amount is water power. Therefore, at the lowest estimate only about one-sixth of the water-power possibilities of the United States are being utilized in manufacturing industries and 25,000,000 water horsepower is permitted to go to waste every year. But this does not tell the whole story of the needless waste of energy that is going on in this country to-day, and will continue to go on until the Federal Government recognizes its obligations to its people to utilize at the earliest date possible this ever-renewing power of falling water so that the coal supply of the United States, which is now being exhausted at the rate of 500,000,000 tons per annum—never again to be returned—may be reserved for the future prosperity of the country. It is estimated that the supply of anthracite coal will, at the present rate of consumption, be exhausted within the next century and that the soft-coal supply will not last more than three or four centuries. Moreover, we must have cheap power if we expect to maintain our position as the leading commercial and industrial country in the world. The invention and use of labor-saving devices have revolutionized the field of commerce and industry. On every hand human power is being supplanted by artificially controlled and regulated natural power. Man's energies are occupied in the discovery of new ways and new means of reducing the forces of nature to a more complete submission to his will. His wonderful success along this line is attested by the recent discovery and development of electric transmission which makes it possible to use the power of falling water 200 miles from the waterfall. Thus 100,000 square miles of territory may be served by hydroelectric power developed from a single waterfall as readily as the old mill at the foot of the dam was supplied a decade ago.

Certain economic conditions peculiar to the United States make it doubly necessary that the power resources of the country be utilized to the highest point of efficiency. For example: For the past 50 years a steady stream of country people has poured into our cities until to-day at least 50 per cent of the population live in our cities and villages. The farm is neglected or abandoned, and from a nation of exporters of foodstuffs we are reduced to a condition where we do not raise sufficient to supply our own market. The price of the market basket is increasing. The refusal of city dwellers to return to the farm makes it necessary to find employment for them in the cities. The mill and the factory offer the only hope. It is here that the skill and genius of the American shows to the best advantage, and if his Government will give him proper consideration he can flood the markets of the world with our manufactured products. Not only can he do it, but he must do it in order to maintain his present standard of living. However, notwithstanding his great genius and energy, the American can not cope with the foreign manufacturer unless he is given a fair opportunity to utilize the power possibilities of our rivers, and thus placed on an equal footing with his foreign competitor, whose Government has placed at his command the water-power resources of the country. Hence the country that best utilizes its water-power resources in the interest of its people will lead the world in commerce and industry.

Donald Cameron Schaefer, a leading economist, has said "water power is the cheapest as well as the most permanent source of energy in the world." "The greatest economy in the world is the development of the great waterfalls of America and the turning of their wasted energies into electricity for heat, light, and power," said a distinguished German commissioner.

Since so large a percentage of the American people must live from manufactures, it is the imperative duty of the Government to develop the water-power resources of the country, so that its people engaged in commerce and industry may have cheap light, heat, and power—three of the principal factors upon which industry and commerce are founded.

The authors of the pending bill admit the necessity of Government control of the development of water power by private capital and present this measure as an embodiment of what that control should be. The Adamson bill proposes to turn over all the vast water-power interests of the Federal Government, including the regulation of hydroelectric groups, involving hundreds of millions of dollars of capital, together with the regulation of the use and sale of hydroelectric current by hundreds of subsidiary public-service corporations, to a department which has no equipment or experience in such regulation, and which was never designed to carry on work of this character.

Hydroelectric regulation deals with the forces of industry and commerce, and it is proposed under this bill to turn this regulation over to the War Department.

The Census Bureau, of the Department of Commerce, in its bulletin of March last, shows that in 1912 there were engaged in the hydroelectric industries of the United States 5,221 central electric lighting and power stations, with a total income of $302,115,599. There were 79,335 people engaged, and the expenses, including salaries and wages, amounted to $234,419,478. There were 435,437 motors of 4,130,619 horsepower capacity served, and the output of the 5,221 stations reached 11,502,963,006 kilowatt hours. What has this hydroelectric development to do with the War Department? It is apparent to anyone who will consider the proposition at all that the War Department has nothing to do with the development, transmission, use, and sale of electric energy, except that its Corps of Engineers may be of use in supervising the purely engineering job of dam construction across streams.

Aside from the engineering phase of construction, the entire subject matter with which this bill deals is within the jurisdiction of two departments, viz: First, Department of the Interior, which has charge of the public domain, the water resources, the Reclamation Service, and the topographic survey; second, the Department of Commerce, which includes the Bureau of Corporations, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Bureau of Standards, the Bureau of the Census, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Bureau of Lighthouses, the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and the Bureau of Navigation. Thus we see that every one of the nine bureaus and branches of the Department of Commerce has more or less direct relation to the industry, commerce, and navigation involved in the development of our waterways and water powers and that the three branches of the Department of the Interior deal directly with the subject matter in point, while only one branch of the War Department—that of Chief of Engineers—has anything to do with the subject.

The executive branch of the Government has 10 departments that assist the President in the performance of the duties of his office. Each of these departments has its own special field of operation and deals with a particular subject. For example, the Secretary of the Treasury has charge of the national finances; the Postmaster General is the head of the Postal Service; the Secretary of Commerce is charged with the work of promoting the commerce and industry of the United States; the Secretary of War has charge of all matters relating to national defense, which includes river and harbor improvements and the prevention of obstructions to navigation.

The War Department, through its improvement of rivers and harbors and its removal of obstructions to navigation, has brought to its aid a great corps of engineers that is the peer of any like body of men in the world. These engineers are needed when it comes to plans and specifications of construction and the survey and estimate of stream capacity.

The amended bill, which I propose as a substitute for House bill 16053, utilizes to the limit all the services of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers which are applicable to the subject, and makes the Secretary of War one of the three members of the governing commission of water-power administration. It then adds to the administration the Secretary of the Interior, with his jurisdiction over public domain, the water resources, the Reclamation Service, and topographic survey; and the Secretary of Commerce, with his nine bureaus of industry, commerce, and navigation, which will bring to the administration of our navigable waters and water powers that particular knowledge and direct relation to the business of the country which our waterways and water-power administration in the past has so sadly needed.

It is foreign to my purpose and desire to throw any blame or shortcoming upon the great corps of able engineers of our War Department. Their knowledge and great abilities will be needed when it comes to plans and specifications of construction and the supervision of the erection of dams, locks, etc. Therefore my bill retains their services in every particular where they are applicable to the subject matter of the bill; besides, it leaves in the War Department full and unhampered control over matters that appertain to navigation as such.

The object of this legislation is to develop and regulate an industry that if properly encouraged by the Government will soon be the greatest in the United States. But the development and regulation of an industry is no part of the education and training of a War Department engineer. Besides, this bill deals with commerce—local, interstate, and foreign—and commerce is a subject radically different from providing for the national defense—the primary duty with which the Secretary of War is charged.

The result is that, while our Army engineers have planned and constructed something like $500,000,000 worth of various kinds of works and improvements on the rivers of the United States, including $160,000,000 on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, they have produced very little commerce and developed very little industry. They are not to blame for that, because commerce and industry are not within the range of their professional knowledge, experience, and jurisdiction. What I desire to accomplish through the proposed amendment of the pending bill is to make our control of navigable waters count in the commercial and industrial development of the United States, by bringing into the administration thereof those official agencies and forces of our Federal Government which deal with industry, commerce, and the development of our public domain.

The day may come when we shall create and develop a separate and distinct executive department of waterways and water powers, fully equipped to cope with the administration of our waterways and the industries, commerce, and navigation arising from and dependent thereupon. But until such time we now have in hand fully organized for all immediate practical purposes three executive departments, excellently equipped by experience, as in the necessary official machinery, to handle all the phases of such regulation and development.

There is an advantage in having a commission of three, especially in view of the large powers and varied duties to be exercised, and the further fact that these powers and duties, embracing, as they do, both the granting of water-power permits and the regulation of service and rates under such grants, involves, as it were, both quasi judicial and semilegislative functions in addition to strictly executive administration for such powers. It has been the almost uniform practice of Congress and of the legislatures of the various States to create commissions and courts of three or more members. Thus, for the regulation of common carriers and the fixing of railway rates on interstate commerce, we have an Interstate Commerce Commission of five members, and upon the subject of approval of projects for waterway improvements we have a Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, consisting of five members. Other commissions which exercise quasi judicial and semilegislative functions, subject to the authority conferred and limited by Congress, are the Isthmian Canal Commission, the International Waterways Commission, the Commission to the Philippine Islands, the Board of Indian Commissioners, and the International Joint High Commission.

When we take into consideration that the maximum potential development of hydroelectric power may reach 65,000,000 horsepower and that now only 7,000,000 of that amount has thus far been developed, there is little question that a commission of three is better qualified to pass upon the approval of permits than one man, and especially when the special field of that one man is war, and not commerce, industry, and internal development. The grant and approval of this vast aggregate of water-power permits is likely to result in much competition and contest of applicants, and involve a great variety of interest. To that end the hearings should be held and the proceedings should take on the form of a legislative inquiry, and thus avoid danger of public criticism as an arbitrary one-man rule. Then again, in the enforcement of regulation of service involving valuation of property as a basis of fixing rates and passing upon charges of extortionate and discriminatory rates, public hearings will be held, which will take on the form of judicial inquiry, where the commission of the three will be far preferable and receive greater popular credence for impartial decisions than a one-man court.

Even the War Department itself in such cases commissions a board—as witness the Board of Engineers on Rivers and Harbors, the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, and the Board of Court-Martial.

But all consider the enormous volume of business involved in such regulation. To-day, with 7,000,000 hydroelectric horsepower developed, the income from 5,221 central electric light and power stations exceeds $300,000,000 per annum. Not all of this is developed on the navigable waters of the United States, but the lion's share of it is always bound to be on such streams, because it is the volume of water that supports commerce and navigation that perforce yields the greatest hydroelectric power for commerce and industry.

In five years hydroelectric development has increased from 5,500,000 horsepower to 7,000,000 horsepower, or about one-third. A bulletin issued in March last by the Census Bureau shows the following facts: The income increased from $85,000,000 in 1902 to $302,000,000 in 1912, a growth of 352 per cent in 10 years; the kilowatt capacity of dynamos increased from 1,212,235 in 1902 to 5,134,689 in 1912, a growth of 232 per cent in 10 years; the output of central light and power stations increased from 2,507,051,115 kilowatt-hours in 1902 to 11,502,963,006 kilowatt-hours in 1912, or 358 per cent in 10 years; the horsepower capacity of stationary motors served increased from 438,005 in 1902 to 4,103,619 in 1912, a percentage growth of 843 per cent.

The enormous rate of hydroelectric expansion which has marked the decade 1902–1912 is almost certain to continue into the future until the full water-power potential maximum of the United States is serving the ever-growing population and their domestic, industrial, and commercial needs. When we take into consideration the present enormous volume of this business as already developed by the great hydroelectric groups and the relationships listed in the report of the Commissioner of Corporations and stop to note that this is less than 10 per cent of the potential maximum of our navigable rivers, and further contemplate the swift progress of this hydroelectric development, how can anyone seriously hold, or even dream for political purposes, that the practical and sensible regulation of these industrial and commercial forces is within the power of the Secretary of War? That honorable and able official certainly has duties and responsibilities sufficient to engage his energies, without undertaking the regulation of an industry which already yields $300,000,000 to the country's corporate income. The regulation of Mexico would be a bagatelle in comparison.

When Canada, Germany, France, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Italy, Russia, Austria-Hungary, and even Africa and India are placing their water powers under the regulation of expert commissions versed in the development of industry and commerce, with special reference to hydroelectric operation and control, what a farce for the greatest industrial nation on the earth to consider the proposition in National Congress assembled of placing its vast water-power resources under the military rule of a staff of colonels.

The reason given for so doing by the gentleman from Georgia, the sponsor of this bill, is that we have done so in the past. But it is our past experience with water powers that we are now trying to get away from. In the past a handful of water-power interests, which the report of the Commissioner of Corporations shows to be in the nature of a great water-power trust, has grasped the great majority of commercially developed water powers of the United States. In the past one great corporation, the General Electric, as shown by former Commissioner Herbert Knox Smith, has secured 50 per cent of the commercial power in 18 States. In the past $500,000,000 has been spent on our navigable rivers without producing commerce. In the past we have given away for the asking a great national resource to companies which, without regulation, are levying upon the public extortionate lighting and power rates. Even the great Keokuk Dam on the Mississippi, with 200,000 horsepower, yielded to it by grace of Congress and the Father of Waters, we find in the report on that subject before the committee of this House, is levying upon the people of the Mississippi Valley rates stated to be higher than even the former charges for power and light obtained from coal consumption and steam power.

It is the past we are trying to correct in the legislation before this House, and in correcting our past with respect to our water-power resources and the regulation of hydroelectric industry and commerce, let us lay the foundation and equip it with the machinery to do the business right.

The first Director of the Census of the United States was the President, George Washington, himself. Beginning thereafter with John Marshall, in 1800, the census was taken for the next 40 years by the Secretary of State. There was no Secretary of the Interior until 1849 and no Secretary of Agriculture until 1889. The Department of Commerce and Labor was first created in 1903 and the Department of Labor in 1913. In fact, in the past our Federal Government has tried a good many makeshifts in handling its business, and one of them was to attach the administration of our waterways and waterpowers as a sort of appendix to the War Department. I submit that it is time that not exactly an appendicitis operation be performed, but that these great resources of our Nation, among the most valuable permanent assets of the 100,000,000 people of our country, receive at the hands of Congress that enlightened, progressive, and business-like administration which their vast and vital importance to the development and prosperity of the Nation demand.

Too long have these great resources of the people been left to the tag-end of a military department. They are worthy of an administration of their own under the auspices of men especially trained in the development of commerce, industry, and navigation and the conservation of our public domain.

Such an efficient and adequate administration Congress may develop under the substitute bill which I propose, which provides that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Commerce shall constitute the water-power commission of the United States. Under the provisions of this amendment we still retain the Secretary of War as a member of the administrative commission and the services of the Chief of Engineers on all engineering phases of water-power development and navigation. We have the Secretary of the Interior, who is chief director of the public domain and its conservation and development, and under him we have the Geological Survey and Reclamation Service, including the topographical branch, which is invaluable to any survey of levels showing the water-power capacity of a watershed. And we have the water-resource branch with its divisions of surface waters, underground waters, and water utilization, organized under the Chief Hydrographer; and likewise we have the General Land Office, which has jurisdiction over the public lands which so often constitute the source of the headwaters of our navigable rivers.

To these two departments now associated with water-power control under different acts of Congress, with more or less conflict of jurisdiction, as shown by the bills before this House, I propose to add the third, the Department of Commerce, which deals directly with the industries, commerce companies, and data concerned in the practical utilization of our water powers. Under the Department of Commerce we get the services of the Bureau of Corporations, which deals directly with the corporations which construct and operate the dams and develop, transmit, use, and sell the power generated on our navigable waters; we secure the services of the Bureau of Standards for the regulation of services by the establishment of scientific tests and standards of operation, production, and consumption; we enlist the statistical services of the Bureau of the Census and the practical commercial experience of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; we secure the engineering aid of the Coast and Goedetic Survey and the further practical cooperation of the Bureau of Navigation. The combined machinery, experience, and professional training of the three departments named under the administrative head of the three department Secretaries as a water-power commission form the basis for a comparatively ideal administration of the water-power resources of the country, as related to industry, commerce, and navigation.

The commission, thus fortified by the detailed examination and judgment of trained experts in every branch of the duties to be performed, with a strong and thoroughgoing water-power law, in which Congress sets forth their powers and duties, has the opportunity and equipment which this country heretofore has ever lacked to give the people an up-to-date progressive and efficient administration of water-power resources which will bring order out of chaos, establish industry where now there is wholesale waste, protect alike the consuming public and the legitimate producer of water power, develop commerce and navigation, and conserve the great natural water resources of the United States, and that on a true and eminently practical basis of successful and sound business, founded on just rates and adequate service to the consuming public which requires light, heat, and power.

ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED BILL.

The method of handling the water-power question by the Government has developed two kinds of water power—those on the public domain and those on navigable streams. The Secretary of the Interior has jurisdiction over those on the public domain and the Secretary of War jurisdiction over those on navigable streams, and then we have a conflict of jurisdiction between the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War. For example, a municipality may go to the Secretary of the Interior under this overlapping system of control and secure a lease of a water power for public purposes; and a public-service corporation may go to the Secretary of War and secure approval of a water-power project to be used for commercial purposes.

Two measures are pending before this House. One, H. R. 16673, originated with the Committee on Public Lands and is introduced by its chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma. The measure gives the Secretary of the Interior power to issue irrevocable leases and permits of water powers on the public domain. The other, H. R. 16053, originates with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and was introduced by its chairman, the gentleman from Georgia. It retains the power to grant permits in Congress and gives the Secretary of War power to regulate hydroelectric projects. The amended bill, which I offer as a substitute for the bill under consideration, to wit, H. R. 16053, overcomes the danger of such conflict of jurisdiction by making both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior members of the water-power commission. This is all the more necessary since the Supreme Court has decided that the watershed of a river having both navigable and non-navigable portions, as all Federal streams have, should be considered a unit. Hence the recent construction of the law as to water power makes it imperative that Congress provide an executive control for these waterways that will be a unit.

The amended bill follows:

A bill (H. R. 17854) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to create a water-power commission for the regulation of such dams and the power and electric current generated thereby.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 23, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Commerce shall constitute the water-power commission of the United States and hereby are authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act. The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise and regulate the development, generation, transmission, sale, and use of hydroelectric power developed under any grant or lease hitherto given by Congress, or any grant, lease, or permit issued under the provisions of this act, for the construction and use of dams across the navigable waters of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That the consent of Congress is hereby given to any State, municipal subdivision thereof, or to any industrial or public-service corporation as ociation, or agency organized under and subject to the laws of such State, after obtaining the permit of the commission as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams and accessory works for water power or other purposes across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States; and such grantee and such permit shall at all times be subject to the provisions of this act, and also subject to such conditions as the commission under the provisions hereof shall make a part of such permit.

"SEC. 3. As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder, the commission shall have due regard to the use and purpose for which such permit is required, priority of purpose and of benefits conferred by such permit and project to rank in the following order:

"First. Benefits to navigation and conservation of water resources.

"Second. Public uses of the State, the municipal subdivisions thereof, and public institutions.

"Third. Industrial use for agricultural, mining, and manufacturing industries.

"Fourth. Commercial power for sale, barter, and exchange, and for use by public-service corporations.

"SEC. 4. That the navigable waters of the United States subject to the provisions of this act are declared to be, and are, the streams, lakes, harbors, and connecting waterways which Congress heretofore has declared or may hereafter declare to be navigable waters or possess navigable capacity.

"SEC. 5. That the commission is hereby authorized and empowered, under such terms, conditions, and general regulations as it may prescribe, consistent with the provisions of this act, to grant a permit to any State, municipal subdivision thereof, or persons organized under the laws thereof, as provided in section 2 hereof, for a period of not longer than 50 years, to construct, maintain, and operate dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary and convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

"SEC. 6. That when such permit granted by the commission to such grantee to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purpose across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, such dam shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and after such approval it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of such plans or specifications has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War.

"SEC. 7. That as a part of such permit such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the commission may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or mainaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate in connection therewith, without expense to the United States, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Chief of Engineers or the commission then may deem necessary in the interests of navigation, in accordance with plans made a part of such approval; and also that in case such facilities of navigation shall not be made a part of such original approval and construction, whenever the commission shall deem such facilities necessary, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power or power generated from water power for building and operating such constructions, and in such original approval, at the discretion of the commission, may be required to maintain and operate such lock without expense to the United States.

"SEC. 8. That as a part of said permit the commission shall require that the plans, specifications, and location for any dam shall be such as shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize, in the interests of navigation and water-power development, the water resources of the region.

"SEC. 9. That as a part of the conditions and stipulations such permit shall provide—

"(a) For reimbursement to the United States of all expenses incurred by the United States with reference to the project, including the cost of any investigation necessary for the approval of the plans as heretofore provided, and for such supervision of construction as may be necessary in the interest of the United States.

"(b) For the payment to the United States of reasonable charges for the benefits which may accrue to such project through the construction, operation, and maintenance by the United States of headwater improvements, including storage reservoirs, on any such stream, such charges to be fixed from time to time by the commission and to be based upon a reasonable compensation equitably apportioned among the grantee and others similarly situated upon the same stream receiving benefits by reason of increase of flow past their water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvements, the total charges to all such beneficiaries from any such headwater improvement not to exceed in any one year an amount equal to 5 per cent of the total investment cost, in addition to the necessary annual expense of the operation of such headwater improvement.

"(c) That in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and accessory works there may be occupied and used such lands of the United States as may be necessary therefor, and in consideration thereof the owner of such dam shall pay to the United States such charges, not to exceed an annual payment of 5 per cent of the fair value of such lands, as may be fixed by the commission, and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing thereby to the interests of navigation as well as to the business of such grantee.

"(d) For the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the commission may deem reasonable and just substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval, whenever the commission shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory works.

"SEC. 10. That the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with any such dam, whether at the expense of such grantee or of the United States, shall at all times be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by any such dam, as shall be made by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, and in the use and operation of such navigation facilities the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the uses of such dam by such grantee for power purposes. Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and such fishways as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, and for failure to comply with any such rule or regulation such grantee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not less than $500 for each month's default, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed or provided by law.

"SEC. 11. That the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise.

"SEC. 12. That any grantee who shall fail or refuse to comply with the lawful order of the commission, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdeameanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and every month such grantee shall remain in default shall be deemed a new offense and subject such grantee to additional penalties therefor; and in addition to said penalties the Attorney General may, on request of the commission, institute proper proceedings in the district court of the United States in the district in which such structure or any of its accessory works may, in whole or in part, exist, for the purpose of having such violation stopped by injunction, mandamus, or other process; and any such district court shall have jurisdiction over all such proceedings and shall have the power to make and enforce all writs, orders, and decrees necessary to compel the compliance with the requirements of this act and the lawful orders of the commission and the performance of any condition or stipulation imposed under the provisions of this act; and if the unlawful maintenance and operation are shown to be such as shall require a revocation of all rights and privileges held under authority of this act, the court may decree such revocation. In case of such a decree, the court may wind up the business of such grantee conducted under the rights in question, and may decree the sale of the dam and all appurtenant property constructed or acquired under authority of this act, and may declare such dam and accessory works to be an unreasonable obstruction to navigation and cause their removal at the expense of the grantee owning or controlling the same, except when the United States has been previously reimbursed for such removal, or may provide for the sale of the dam and all accessory and appurtenant works constructed under authority of this act for the further development of water power, and may make and enforce such other and further orders and decrees as equity demands; and in case of such a sale for the further development of water power the vendee shall take the rights and privileges and shall perform the duties which belonged to the previous grantee, and shall assume such outstanding obligations and liabilities arising out of the maintenance and operation of said dam and accessory works for power purposes as the court may deem equitable in the premises.

"SEC. 13. That no property or project installed and operated under the provisions or benefits of this act shall be assigned or transferred except upon the written consent and under conditions specified by the commission, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the purpose of financing the business of such owner, and any successor or assign of such property or project, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original owner hereunder.

"SEC. 14. That the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of not longer than 50 years from and after the date of the completion of the structure described in the original approval, and after the expiration of said period such rights shall continue until compensation has been made to said grantee for the fair value of its property, as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 15. That at any time after the expiration of said period the commission may terminate the rights hereby granted upon giving to the owners thereof one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States, or by any person authorized by the commission, of all of the property dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereby granted, which shall include all necessary and appurtenant property created or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and all other property the value and usefulness of which would be destroyed or seriously impaired by such termination, and upon paying the fair value of said property together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States and assuming all contracts entered into prior to the receipt by it of said notice of termination which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof, or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances existing at the time such contracts were made. The fair value of said property and the reasonableness and good faith of such contracts shall be determined by agreement between the commission and the owners of such property, and in the event of their failure to agree, then by proceedings instituted by the United States, or by any person authorized by Congress, in the district court of the United States within which any portion of such dam may be located. In the determination of the value of said property upon the termination of said grant as above provided no value shall be claimed by or allowed for the consent hereby granted, nor for good will, profit in pending contracts, nor other conditions of current or prospective business, and it is further provided that lands, rights of way, and interests therein, shall be valued on the basis of actual cost.

"SEC. 16. That all charges, rates, and service by any grantee or lessee hereunder, or connecting company engaged in the transmission and sale of power and electric current generated by any project subject to the provisions of this act, shall be reasonable, adequate, without discrimination, and subject to the regulations of the commission. To enforce such just and reasonable and nondiscriminatory charges and secure adequate and efficient service to consumers, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe and examine reports and systems of account, books, and other records, establish standards and make tests of service, control the issuance of stocks and bonds by corporations engaged in the generation, transmission, or sale of such hydroelectric product, and require them to submit statements of all costs of property, production, distribution, sale, and use of product, subject to such grant or lease and connected with such project, furnishing such information upon oath or by witness or in such form and upon such blanks as the commission may order and require; and on complaint of any State, municipality, or consumers affected thereby, and full hearing thereon, the commission is empowered to determine and prescribe the maximum rates to be charged, based on fair and reasonable returns on the valuation of the property and cost of operation, and ascertain and order the requirements of service to be rendered; and in case of any violation of such orders of the commission, or the refusal of such grantee or lessee to give the commission and its agents full access to its property and records, the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply. It is herewith provided, however:

"(a) That when a State in which such water power and electric current is used shall notify the commission of the passage of laws and the perfecting of administration to effectively provide for such regulation of rates, charges, and service within such State and its municipal subdivisions, the regulations of the commission shall not apply to local and intrastate business therein.

"(b) That when the power generated by such project enters both interstate and intrastate commerce, the commission is hereby authorized to join with any State in which such power is used in effecting such joint and interlocking system of Federal and State regulation as in its judgment shall most effectively promote the general public interest and carry out the purposes of this act.

"(c) That in such valuation for rate-making purposes of the property operated under such grant there may be considered by the commission any lock or other aid to navigation, including all capital expenditures required of the grantee by the United States, but no value shall be allowed for the good will or franchise value of the lease or permit hereby or heretofore granted.

"SEC. 17. That the grantee shall commence the construction of the dam and accessory works within one year from the date of the approval herein provided, and shall thereafter, in good faith and with due diligence, prosecute such construction, and shall, within the further term of three years, complete and put in commercial operation such part of the ultimate development as the commission shall deem necessary to supply the reasonable needs of the then available market, and shall, from time to time thereafter, construct such portion of the balance of such ultimate development as said commission may direct and within the time specified by said commission so as to supply adequately the reasonable market demands until such ultimate development shall be completed; and extensions of the periods herein specified, not to exceed two years, may be granted by the commission, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, when, in his judgment, the public interest will be promoted thereby. In case the grantee shall not commence actual construction within the time herein prescribed, or as extended by the commission, then the authority as to such grantee shall terminate, and in case any dam and accessory works be not completed within the time herein specified or extended as herein provided, then the Attorney General, upon the request of the commission, shall institute proper proceedings in the proper district court of the United States for the revocation of said authority, the sale of the works constructed, and such other equitable relief as the case may demand, as provided for in section 13 of this act.

"SEC. 18. That the commission may lease to any applicant embraced in section 2 hereof, who has complied with the laws of the State in which the dam is constructed or to be constructed by the United States, the right to develop power from the surplus water over and above that required for navigation at any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed, either with or without contribution by the applicant, and owned by the United States, and on such terms as may be deemed by the commission for the best interests of the United States, and in awarding such lease preference shall be given to the applicant whose plans are deemed by the commission best adapted to conserve the public interest as provided in section 3 hereof, and all such leases and the parties thereto and the terms and conditions thereof shall be subject to the control and regulations of the commission under the general provisions of this act.

"SEC. 19. That no works constructed, maintained, and operated under the provisions of this act shall be owned, trusteed, or controlled by any device or in any manner so that they may form a part of, or in any manner effect, a combination in the form of an unlawful trust or form the subject of an unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy, or the exercises of any other business contemplated: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful under the approval and regulations of the commission for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents to enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, accounting therefor and paying therefor under regulations to be prescribed by the commission.

"In no case shall such an arrangement be permitted to raise the price, render unjust or unfair any practice, work, or discrimination, or operate in restraint of trade.

"SEC. 20. That the word 'persons' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and the plural, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations, or other grantees. The word 'dam' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and plural, as the case demands.

"SEC. 21. That all the provisions of this act for regulating the construction and use of dams and the transmission, sale, and use of power developed thereby shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized, as well as to new projects to which the consent of the commission may hereafter be granted. It is likewise provided that holders of previous authorizations are entitled to receive on application to the commission new permits subject to the provisions of this act and subject further to such terms and conditions as the commission shall deem just and reasonable in the premises and for the best protection of the public interests.

"SEC. 22. For carrying out the provisions of this act the commission shall have authority to appoint a secretary and employ such experts, assistants, and other employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, and provide for the compensation and expenses of the same and the necessary office supplies from such sum as shall be provided by law."

Before taking up an analysis of my bill I wish to say that in drafting H. R. 17854 I have profited by a number of provisions that seemed wise, wholesome, practical, and for the safeguarding of the public interests which I note in the public-domain bill. Likewise, in drafting the section which provides for the regulation of hydroelectric service and also in the section which covered the powers and duties of the water-power commission, I have followed, in the main, similar provisions found in the interstate-commerce act. Moreover, I have profited by the Canadian, German, French, and Swiss water-power acts, especially the new acts of 1909 and later, and also from the official suggestions of Government experts connected with the Departments of War, Interior, and Commerce and with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

To summarize:

Section 1 creates a water-power commission of the United States, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Commerce, to enforce the act and regulate hydroelectric development, generation, transmission, sale, and use by and from dams across navigable waters.

Section 2 specifies and restricts the class of grantees to which permits may issue, protecting against indiscriminate grants to irresponsible parties and limiting such permits to States, municipalities, or an industry or public-service corporation, association, or agency organized under and subject to the laws of such State where the project is located.

Section 3 provides for the contingency of contesting applications for grants of and determines the issue on the basis of priority of purpose and public benefit from the use. The section follows the Adamson bill in naming as the first ground, or priority of benefits, navigation and protection of water resources, because the power of Congress in the premises is derived from its control of navigation. This section also follows the Ferris bill in naming the public use as the next in priority. Direct industrial use by agricultural, mining, and manufacturing industries follows next in order, because these industries should not be compelled to go to the middleman in the shape of a public-service corporation in order to develop industry from public power. Commercial power for sale, barter, and exchange, and for use by public-service corporations is next in order and ranks fourth and last. While this last class of applications will be the most numerous and have the largest capital backing, their demands should be held subordinate to navigation, State and municipal public use, and industries; otherwise the enactment of the bill into law would lead to the ultimate and irrevocable establishment of the very danger that we are trying by this legislation to prevent and combat, namely, the monopolization of our hydroelectric resources by large commercial forces, thereby compelling the people of the United States who own the streams and water powers to submit to the excessive charges of middlemen in order to get access to and benefit from their own public resources in the earth and its waters. All the new water-power acts of progressive countries and States in America and Europe provide public safeguards against such danger of monopoly, and we of all countries must guard against such commercial aggrandizement.

Section 4 defines navigable waters over which the commission has jurisdiction as those which Congress has declared and may declare navigable. This settles the controversy raised between the Committee on the Public Lands and the Interstate Commerce Committee in the debate on the Adamson bill the other day and in connection with the Supreme Court decisions referred to, to determine the boundary of the water-power commission's jurisdiction as nearly as it is practicably possible.

Section 5 marks a new departure in regard to the issue of water-power permits on navigable streams. It places them on the same basis as water-power permits on the public domain, so far as being issued by the administrative interest of the legislative branch of the Government. Besides, whereas public-domain permits on navigable streams under this bill are issued by the Secretary of the Interior, water-power permits on navigable streams under this bill are issued by the commission. We know from experience that a special act of Congress is a failure. Special legislation on such subjects has never worked satisfactorily either in State or Nation. In my own State the people amended the constitution several years ago so as to prohibit special legislation. It is impossible for a large legislative body made up of members from every section of the Union to possess accurate knowledge sufficient to intelligently pass upon each application. Besides, the custom of congressional courtesy has arisen in such matters, and Members having special bills accepting the statements of another Member with a like bill, which gives rise to a condition of logrolling, which is demoralizing to anything like a businesslike and scientific administration of the public business and the conservation of the natural resources. In this grant of permit-issuing power to the water-power commission I have followed the main provision of the Ferris bill and the Department of the Interior act in its grant of power to issue leases to the Secretary of the Interior. This act has been tried and thoroughly tested and proven to be a wise measure both for conservation and development. As stated in the debate by the gentleman from Oklahoma, the act administered by the Secretary of the Interior has developed more water power than all the congressional acts the War Department has granted for several years. The addition of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Commerce should strengthen the measure, as it will bring into the discussion of such grants the two departments directly concerned with navigable waters and commerce, and therefore cover the whole subject.

The above five sections constitute the most distinctive sections of the substitute bill. In brief, they create a water-power commission, specify and restrict the class of grants, define the extent of the commission's jurisdiction over navigable streams, set up a basis for priority of purpose, public use and benefit to govern the issuing of permits, clothes the commission with power to issue permits and regulate the projects built and operating, and surround both the commission and the grantees with legal restrictions to issue on the one hand, the grantee in the possession of an irrevocable lease of not longer than 50 years, so long as he abides by the lawful conditions thereof; and on the other hand, the public with the development of its water powers under proper legal safeguards.

The above five sections added to the present law, approved June 25, 1910, may indeed constitute a well-developed basis for water-power administration and development.

But I am not unmindful of the able and efficient work of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of this House in taking testimony from water-power expert authorities and drafting a bill to meet the wishes of business men that have been successful in promoting, financing, organizing, and operating hydroelectric enterprises; and I appreciate the force of the practical view of the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Georgia, when in his speech on June 30, explaining House bill 16053 to this House, he said:

The committee bill, it is believed, will invite and attract capital to construct dams in the navigable streams of the country and improve the navigation of these streams and develop water power at the same time. At this time there is not a single dam under construction in navigable waters by private capital. If the House will pass the bill just as the committee has reported it, within a year's time it is believed that the construction of dams in the navigable rivers of the country by private capital will begin and continue. It is true that there is no market for the power that will be developed at many of these dams, but markets will be created at or near the dam sites for manufacturing air fertilizers and other electric-furnace products. If the bill is passed, hydroelectric developments that have been going to Canada and Europe and are now going to these countries will stop and the developments will, as they should, be maintained for the navigable streams of our own country.

The distinguished chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee reenforced this statement with the testimony of such leading hydroelectric managers and promoters as J. W. Worthington, of Alabama, Hugh L. Cooper, the owner and builder of the Keokuk Dam, and such other financial and hydroelectric authorities as Harris & Son, Forbes & Co., Hodenpyl, Hardy & Co., E. H. Rollins & Sons, Lee, Higginson & Co., and Esterbrook & Co., the testimony of all of whom is published in the hearings had before the gentleman's committee and supported the general tenor of the recommendation of that committee.

I appreciate the force of the testimony of Mr. Cooper, who gave the committee a list of 56 American and European banking houses that refused to finance the Keokuk project under existing grants and conditions. Likewise, I took note of the testimony of Mr. Worthington, to the effect that 19 hydroelectric companies, controlling 506,500 horsepower of water projects, have been through receiverships or proved bad investments. I note the point made by the gentleman from Georgia, that the ultimate development in the State of Georgia will be 250,000 horsepower, that on the Chattahoochee the development will reach 300,000 horsepower, and that on the Coosa River there is a possible development of 300,000 horsepower. I also appreciate the force of the gentleman's statement that—

Twenty-three authorizations out of 25 have not moved a peg under the 1906 act, and that although in the past we have granted 95 authorizations to build dams for the improvement of navigation through the temptation and incentive of private gain to the investor we have only succeeded in seeing about 13 constructed and put in operation.

In short, Mr. Speaker, as stated by the chairman of the committee, "capital is a very old bird" and has been hard to bait into the trap, but the committee announces that it has found "bait" that will lead the quarry into the trap. They have made the proposition sufficiently attractive to capital, and they have the testimony of capital to sustain that.

"So we introduced this bill," says the chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, "and reported it, and I believe it will be a great blessing to the country if passed." Among these blessings the gentleman unfolds to the people on the Coosa and Chattahoochee how private capital thus attracted will "open up all this navigation and at the same time furnish the people light and the cleanest, best, and cheapest fuel, electric force enough to manufacture not only fertilizer but every other conceivable thing that the genius of the country could think of, and make a network of trolley lines all over the fair country."

So, gentlemen of the House, after providing in the above five sections for an efficient administrative commission to execute the provisions of this act and define their duties and jurisdiction and surround the same with proper safeguards, I propose to embody in my amended bill substantially all the entire body of the bill drafted and reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in order that the provisions on which the committee relies for promoting such an era of hydroelectric development and prosperity as that pictured by its chairman may have full and untrammeled power to see the light of day. The committee bill, whether intended so or not, is nothing more or less than a make-believe attempt to get away from the old doctrine that was so universally accepted in the past—that restriction imposed upon the right to make assault upon nature's storehouses was a restriction and an abridgment of human liberty, and therefore hostile to the principle of free government. The committee bill is ingenious in this respect. It purports to supervise the development and use of hydroelectric power, one of the greatest natural resources known to man, whereas in truth and in fact it only permits private capital to make assault under the guise of Government regulation upon this boundless and inexhaustible source of the Nation's wealth.

I am anxious to see this storehouse unlocked to the activities of the great captains of industry, but under such terms and conditions as will redound to the benefit of the public and not to enrich a few hydroelectric groups that have already fastened their tentacles upon this industry.

To resume analysis of the amended bill:

We are reminded by the gentleman from Oklahoma, chairman of the public-domain committee, that House bill 16053 apparently divests the Secretary of the Interior of jurisdiction over water power on public lands and has a few other dangerous points in matters of detail, which should be amended before the bill can pass the House. Therefore, in my substitute amendment, I have attempted to meet such contingencies while following the general provisions of House bill 16053.

Section 6, after the opening words, which refer to the permit as issuing by the commission, instead of being granted by Congress, is a recapitulation of section 1 of House bill 16053, in which approval of plans and specifications is left wholly, as in the original bill and present law, in the hands of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers.

Section 7, which governs the construction of locks, booms, sluices, and other works required of the grantee for the protection of navigation, is the same as in section 2 of House bill 16053, except the regulation is in the hands of the commission and Chief of Engineers instead of in the hands of the latter and the Secretary of War.

Section 8, which provides that the project shall adapt itself to a comprehensive policy of water improvement, is the same as section 3 of the pending bill, except that the commission controls instead of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers.

Section 9, with its four subdivisions, specifying the conditions of construction, maintenance, and operation of dams, is taken over bodily.

Section 10 leaves the operation of navigation facilities in connection with the dam, including the level of the pool, lights, and signals, under the supervision of the War Department, as in the original bill.

Section 11, which provides that the grantee is liable to damages, is the same as under the existing bill.

Section 12, the penalty and forfeiture clause, which provides for legal process by injunction, mandamus, and fine, and conditions of property for violation of the act, is unchanged.

Section 13, governing the transfer and assignment of property, is unchanged, except the written consent of the commission is substituted for that of the Secretary of War.

Section 14 of the amended bill differs from section 9 of the original in that the period of the grant, instead of being a uniform and strict 50-year grant in all cases, is arranged to read "a period of not longer than 50 years." This gives the commission latitude to adjust the term of the grant to suit the condition. While a public-service corporation might want a flat 50-year grant, a State institution or municipality might want a shorter term, as, indeed, a mine or mill might contemplate a use for materially less than a 50-year period. Then, again, in renewing a partially expired permit under the provisions of this act it might be against public policy to give a company whose term had only five years to run the same 50-year period in a new permit that another received who was entitled to several times five years under its original grant. Furthermore, as this bill aims to effect cooperation of Federal and State regulation in the case of projects which are both interstate and local in the extent of the commission to effect such desired result, it should have the latitude to adjust its arrangements to harmonize with the State law. A State water-power grant varies from 20 to 40 years. In a number of new State water-power acts, however, whatever term is secured by the grantee, whether 50 years or less, he knows the term before he undertakes the project. The term is irrevocable thereafter, except his own violation of the law or terms of the permit, so that capital is on just as secure a basis as under the original bill. Experts who lay stress on this 50-year term of the grant are careful not to allude to European provisions on the subject, where successful hydroelectric projects are being financed at this time on a 30-year grant in some cases and for periods varying from 25 to 50 years, according to conditions. Experience shows that where a company gives the public satisfactory service and reasonable rates and attempts no extortion or evasion of the law there is little disposition to refuse a renewal of its permit at the expiration of the original term. An unduly long term, on the other hand, is a premium on high rates, indifferent service, and autocratic treatment of the public and its lawful authorities.

Section 15 provides, in the main, the text of section 10 in the original bill. It deals with the expiration of the term of the grant and the process to be followed in case the Government takes over the property. The principal difference is, first, that the amended draft substitutes the commission for the Secretary of War in making the adjustment; and, second, that in the event of the purchase of the property by the Government that the public settles for the land and the right of way on the basis of the original cost, instead of on the basis of released valuation after population of the surrounding country has added a large unearned increment to land values. In this the amended bill follows the public-domain bill, reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Section 16, which covers the vital and far-reaching subject of regulation of rates, charges, and service of companies engaged in hydroelectric development, transmission, sale, and use, is a complete redraft of section 11 of the original bill, besides being far more complete and detailed in its provisions, attempts to take that section out of its present condition of uncertainty and mystery. In shaping the revised section the interstate-commerce act for the regulation of common carriers is followed in main outline. The water-power commission is given regulation of hydroelectric service and rates on practically the same basis as the Interstate Commerce Commission over railways, telephones, telegraphs, and express companies' rates and service. The bill, however, while denoting the general terms of control, including authority to prescribe accounts, reports, maximum rates, and service standards, with full access to property and records to ascertain cost units and otherwise, does not attempt the minutia of detail contained in the interstate-commerce act, which does not appear necessary, but the main skeleton of procedure is clearly denoted in such manner as to give the commission full authority to make regulation effective in the public interest. Regulation embraces not only new projects but all existing projects, so that under the bureaus and departments of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Commerce it is possible for the Federal Government to enforce upon the hydroelectric service of the country that salutary and systematic supervision that the country has secured over railroad rates and service.

The cooperation of the State is fully recognized in cases of local and intrastate electric service, and where the electric current from the water-power projects, as in a number of cases, is both intrastate and interstate commerce the commission is authorized to arrange with the State or States affected a joint and interlocking Federal and State system of regulation. Thus, instead of conflict between Federal and State jurisdiction, with resulting "twilight zones" of no control or popular prejudice against Federal control, there will be a spirit of cooperation and mutual helpfulness in which the Federal Government comes to the aid of the people of the State, where otherwise they would be powerless to remedy the situation and cope with the interstate-commerce interests. Provision is made for complaint by the State, its municipalities, and consumers. Public hearings are held and violations are covered by the general penalty and forfeiture provisions of the act. However, in fixing the property valuation of the grantee as a basis for rate making, no good will or franchise value of lease or permit is allowed.

Section 17 governs the progress of the construction of the works in accordance with the original bill.

Section 18 governs the lease of dams built by the Government, according to the provisions of the original, except that in cases of contesting applications for the lease the priority rule laid down in section 3 of the amended bill applies, namely, navigation, public use, and industrial use take precedence over power for commercial sale.

Section 19, the antitrust section, is similar in general outline to the original bill except in two vital particulars: Exchange of current between two different grantees is allowed, subject not only to approval but to regulations laid down by the water-power commission; and, second, the obscure and miscellaneous to grantees to assist one another whenever necessary as given in section 15 of the original bill is omitted. This avoids the danger of giving the hydroelectric group, as the General Electric aggregation, general immunity from the antitrust laws.

Section 20 covers the ground of section 16 of the original act, with an immaterial addition which better fits the amended form. Sections 13 and 17 of the original bill are omitted and a substitute is offered for the latter. Section 13 of the original bill in its latest form contains what appears to be a woodchuck. On the face of it the section reserves the right of Congress to amend or repeal the act, but the ulterior meaning is doubtless the opposite and the force of it may be to give the grantees a contract which stops Congress from the exercise of its constitutional power to amend its own acts of regulation. The section begins as follows:

SEC. 13. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all dams which may be authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act wherever Congress determines that the provisions of this act have been violated.

Evidently the legal construction to be placed on this section, in the light of the clause italicized is that unless Congress determines that the terms of the grant have been violated—and the grantee can well afford to avoid that contingency—Congress can not exercise its right to alter, amend, or repeal this act of public regulation without liability being incurred by the Government for violation of vested rights. No stipulation of this kind should go into a general regulation act.

Section 21 is a complete revision of section 17 and avoids two dangers: First, a wholesale repeal of all acts of Congress embracing former authorizations and grants; and, second, a wholesale reissue of new 50-year grants. Regulation of construction, transmission, sale, and use of hydroelectric plants and products is applied to all projects present and future; but instead of wholesale repeal of existing grants and reissue thereof for 50-year terms, holders of previous authorizations are given the opportunity to recharter under the new act under conditions which the commission may deem just in the premises.

If the old grant is near expiration, the commission will have a chance to issue a new short-term permit that would be fair to the company and to the public, and if the grantee has scarcely started on the term of the old grant, he may receive a new long-term grant that will be just under the conditions. If the outstanding contracts and obligations of the company are such that the repeal of its old charter would be unwise, it may still operate under the regulations of the commission as to accounts, reports, rates, and standards of service while retaining its old charter. In short, the redraft of section 17 in section 21 hereof gives the water-power commission complete and elastic administrative authority to adjust each situation on a basis that is at once practical from the viewpoint of business, and at the same time fully protects the interests of the Government and the general public.

The final section, 22, authorizes the commission to appoint a secretary and other needed help, subject to such appropriations as may be provided by law.

The amended bill, as a whole, combines, I believe, the best provisions of the pending bill, while at the same time utilizing the best suggestions contained in the Public Lands Committee bill. It therefore combines the best ideas of the Secretary of the Interior and his experts with those of the Secretary of War and his advisers. It then proceeds to join the forces of the two administrative departments for carrying out the provisions of the bill, and adds the Department of Commerce, with all its valuable machinery, to complete the program. The bill also provides for the best that France, Germany, Switzerland, and Canada, where water-power administration has proven to be a practical success, has to offer, together with much that experts have laid before the two committees of this House on the subject of water-power development and regulation.

Incidentally, moreover, the amended bill provides for a peaceful settlement of the differences between the committee and Members who stand for water-power control by the Secretary of War and those who stand for water-power control by the Secretary of the Interior. Mediation is provided by a joint commission of three. As stated before, the Supreme Court of the United States apparently requires some such joint control in order to bring about effective control by Congress over the water-power situation. In the Rio Grande case the court stopped the construction of a dam on the nonnavigable portion of the Rio Grande in New Mexico because it affected navigation on the navigable portion of the river on the international boundary. In this and the Chandler-Dunbar case, affecting the St. Marys River, the court took the advanced position that control of Congress reached the entire stream and watershed to its ultimate source and should be considered as a unit. This merges the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior over waterways and public lands into the same control as that of the Secretary of War over navigable waters, and I submit the proposition to this House that this means, both in law and logic, that if Congress desires adequate and effective administration over its vast water-power resources, it must effect a joint executive administration thereof instead of a divided, conflicting, and ineffective attempt at administration. Merging the Departments of War and Interior with that of Commerce is logical for the full control of industries, commerce, and navigation involved. I submit it is the businesslike solution of our great navigation and water-power problem.

DIVIDED CONTROL OF HEADWATERS.

Mr. Chairman, the very text of the pending bill forces upon this House the necessity of broadening the administration of our waterways and water powers. The Interstate Commerce Committee of this body have drafted into section 4 of House bill 16053 four subsections as a part of the conditions and stipulations which shall go into every water-power grant of Congress, whether they be previous authorizations of the United States or those to be made in the years to come.

One of those conditions and stipulations is subsection (b), which provides for the payment to the United States of charges for "the benefits which may accrue to such project through the construction, operation, and maintenance by the United States of headwater improvements, including storage reservoirs." It relates to "benefits by reason of increased flow past their water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvement," which are to be charged against the several grantees which receive increased power thereby, "such charges to be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers."

Subsection (c) of this section provides the following condition and stipulation of every water-power grant:

That in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and accessory works there may be occupied and used such lands of the United States as may be necessary therefor, and in consideration thereof the owner of such dam shall pay to the United States such charges, not to exceed an annual payment of 5 per cent of the fair value of such lands, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers.

Other sections of this bill likewise extend the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers to the sources of the waterway. Section 3 gives the War Department control of water-power grants to the end that the plans, specifications, and location of the dam "shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway," and "best adapted to conserve and utilize, in the interests of navigation and water-power development, the water resources of the region." Section 5 gives "control of the level of the pool" and other conditions affecting navigation to the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers; and the entire subject of obstructions to navigation, as well as water supply affecting navigable capacity, is in the control of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers.

I am not questioning the wisdom of these provisions, but I am calling attention to the fact that we may know where the facts lead us. Now, here is one of the dilemmas into which the facts and these provisions of the bill lead us.

Everyone knows that the public lands of the United States yet remaining unsold are chiefly at the headwaters of our streams. The lower valleys have been taken by settlers and largely placed under cultivation. The valleys always go first, because they offer the best opportunities to agriculture. The hills that are the sources of the streams constitute the public-land remnant, for the administration of which we have created the Interior Department.

The land areas unappropriated and unreserved, which constitute the headwaters of our chief navigable rivers, compose a great scattered empire. Not including 360,000,000 acres in Alaska, there are still nearly 300,000,000 acres of public lands unsold and unreserved in the United States. These are largely in the chief water-power States. Then there are 186,000,000 acres in our national forests, and these are located chiefly at the headwaters of our streams, and, more than that, constitute an important factor in the maintenance of our streams, both for water power and navigation.

In looking over the water-power statistics compiled by the Geological Survey and Bureau of Corporations I find that 44,000,000 horsepower of the 60,000,000 of the potential maximum that may yet be developed is in the Western States, in which lie the bulk of our public lands. The nine States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Arizona, and Utah are credited by the Commissioner of Corporations with the possession of 70 per cent of the estimated minimum water power of the United States. Over 2,000,000 additional horsepower of the assumed maximum and 1,000,000 horsepower of the available minimum is credited to Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Michigan, which are the sources of the Mississippi and Great Lakes watersheds.

When we consult the public lands statistics and the national forests statistics, we find that these same States hold the great public land and forest reserves of the Nation under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Moreover, when we open the report of the Committee on the Public Lands of this House and consult the data on water-power hearings, we find that "installation of water wheels aggregating 18,000,000 horsepower capacity may reasonably be made on power sites of the public domain on the basis of low-water conditions, and that this may be increased to 29,000,000 horsepower if all storage facilities are realized."

The reports of the Geological Survey and Forest Service give a detailed list of 370 plants of 2,949,000 estimated horsepower capacity already installed in 11 Western States containing the lion's share of our public lands. These water powers are located either on the navigable or nonnavigable portions of the navigable waters which the pending bill places under the control of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, while at the same time these water powers, or the sources of their water supply, are largely within the public domain which is under the executive administration of the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill reported by the Public Lands Committee of this House provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered to issue leases, under such terms, conditions, and general regulations as he may prescribe, to construct, maintain, and operate dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary and convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power within the boundaries of the public domain; and these boundaries contain those headwaters and lands which the pending bill of the Interstate Commerce Committee place under the control of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers. There appears to be only one logical solution—to place both departments on the commission for the control and regulation of water powers. The unit of regulation must be coextensive with jurisdiction.

There is an interesting situation which illustrates the case in my own State of Minnesota. The greatest Federal reservoir enterprise of the United States is that at the headwaters of the Mississippi River in Minnesota. The project in force, which is 95 per cent completed, contemplates the construction of six great reservoirs at Winnibigoshish, Leech Lake, Pokegama, Sandy Lake, Pine River, and Gull Lake, and an equalizing canal between Winnibigoshish and Leech Lake Reservoirs. Up to the time of the last report of the Chief of Engineers the total of $1,633,963 had been expended. The five timber dams originally built have been in operation many years, and have been instrumental in conserving for the summer months of the year both navigation on the upper Mississippi and power for the large number of water powers on the upper river for the Twin City district and 200 miles above.

Page 19 of the report of the Chief of Engineers, June 30, 1913, states of the purpose:

The reservoirs are operated mainly with a view to the improvement of navigation on the Mississippi River, but with due regard to other legitimate interests. Incidentally they are of great benefit in mitigating floods and in regulating the flow of water for power purposes.

The reservoirs are now being reconstructed with reinforced concrete and made thoroughly modern and efficient in every respect. Of course, everyone in our State, especially business men associated with flour and lumber manufacturing industries, and public utility companies using light and power, know that the greatest benefit derived for years has been from increased, improved, and more uniform and reliable hydroelectric and direct water power. These reservoirs have been a prominent factor in Minnesota's wonderful industrial development. My colleague from the neighboring district [Mr. STEVENS] has called attention to the fact that these reservoirs have given the upper Mississippi 18 inches of added depth of flow during the summer months. Of course, you can not give this added flow to navigation without giving it to the numerous water powers over which the stream flows.

There are seven hydroelectric installations on the Mississippi in Minnesota in operation at the present time, of something like 75,000 aggregate horsepower capacity, but the completion and operation of as many other authorizations will eventually double the hydroelectric capacity of the upper Mississippi in our State; and the great regulatory source for conservation and maintenance of all of these water powers is the great reservoir system of the Federal Government at Mississippi headwaters.

These works have been built by the War Department and are under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. At the same time, the Government has still a considerable block of public lands in and around Mississippi headwaters in our State.

The situation in Minnesota illustrates the force of the point of the amended bill which I offer as a substitute to this House. Our jurisdiction and regulation of this subject must be a unit in order to secure efficiency and develop and conserve the national resources, while developing industries, commerce, and navigation. Join the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Commerce and you have a trinity of executive administration which fully meets all requirements from every legal, political, and business point of view; and this House and the country may go forward with full confidence that henceforth the United States has laid a foundation for waterway and water-power administration second to none in the world.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to renew my request that all gentlemen who speak have the right to extend and revise their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may be permitted to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on the 3d day of March, 1914, on the floor of the House I submitted some remarks upon the agricultural schedule of the Underwood tariff bill. In these remarks especial attention was called to the statement of the Ways and Means Committee of the House in support of that bill, where its majority members declared, on page 18 of that report, "In our judgment, the future growth of our great industries lies beyond the seas." Upon that occasion I submitted tables showing the importations of certain important farm products for the first four months under the new tariff bill compared with corresponding months one year before.

Special attention was called to the vast increase in each of these articles admitted at our ports under either removal of the duty or radical reduction.

I have taken occasion to prepare from authoritative sources the imports, both as to quantity and value, of 27 of the leading agricultural products, a part of Schedule G and one item of K, affected by the Underwood tariff bill, for the first eight months following the enactment of that law. Tables are herewith submitted with explanatory notes.

Imports into the United States of certain farm products for October, November, December, 1912, January, February, March, April, and May, 1913, under the 1909 tariff act, together with the imports for the same articles for the same months during 1913 and 1914 under the 1913 tariff act; the total imports of these articles for the eight months under the present law compared with the same eight months under the 1909 law and the per cent of increase; the total imports of these articles for the eight months under the present law compared with the imports under the 1909 law for a full year ending June 30, 1913.

[23] Per cents of increase figured on values.
[24] Total value of all meat products, except sausage, bologna, and bologna casings, for eight months, $15,926,541.
[25] No figures for months under old law. Quantity and value figured as two-thirds of year.

Recent figures submitted by the Secretary of Commerce show that the increase in importations of finished products was only 8.8 per cent under the new law, while the increase of the farm products mentioned in the above table increased 149 per cent, there being a very large increase in case of each article.

It will be noted that on the several articles mentioned there was a collective increase in value of imports of $79,427,186, all thrown on the market of the United States in competition with our own products. That tremendous amount came largely from the cheap lands, produced by cheap labor, and carried by cheap transportation from Australia, Argentina, Canada, and Mexico.

Verily, the prophecy of the Ways and Means Committee, "In our judgment the future growth of our great industries lies beyond the seas," is coming true. Agriculture is our greatest industry.

It will be recalled that of the additions to the free list made in the Underwood tariff bill nearly 80 per cent in point of value of products so affected were farm products.

There was no party platform warranting this discrimination against the farmer. Both the Republican and Progressive platforms declared in favor of protection being extended to the farmer the same as to the other industries, while the Democratic platform favored reduction, but did not promise or threaten to place farm products on the free list.

An examination of the import and revenue statistics for the period beginning with 1897 and ending with 1912 showed some remarkable facts, all of which indicated that Schedule G was the one schedule which seemed to combine the desirable qualities of a revenue producer, a competitive tariff, and a protective tariff, as the following facts will demonstrate:

First. Schedule G, containing many articles not in the foregoing table, in 1897, in point of view of dutiable imports, ranked No. 5, while in 1912 it was first.

Second. Schedule G as a revenue producer among the schedules in 1897 ranked ninth, while in 1912 it had risen to third.

Third. Schedule G in 1897 showed dutiable importations of only $33,716,958; in 1912 it had risen to $117,711,156; and Schedule G in 1897 produced only $8,613,987 revenue, increased in 1912 to $34,146,071.

Fourth. While Schedule G in 1897 had but 8 per cent of all the dutiable importations, in 1912 it had risen to 14 per cent.

Fifth. That while Schedule G in 1897 produced only 5 per cent of the import revenues, in 1912 it produced 11 per cent.

Sixth. It will be noted that while the revenues of Schedule G in 1897 were less than those of Schedule C (metals), in 1912 they were twice as great. While the revenues from Schedule G in 1897 were less than one-half those of Schedule F (tobacco), it in 1912 exceeded Schedule F by nearly $9,000,000. While approximately equal to Schedule H (spirits) in 1897, Schedule G in 1912 doubled it in revenue production. While Schedule G was less than Schedule I (cotton) in 1912 it produced three times Schedule I's revenue. That Schedule G in 1912 produced more revenue than Schedule I (cotton manufactures), Schedule K (wool, raw wool amounting to $14,000,000 eliminated), and Schedule D (lumber) combined.

Seventh. The dutiable importations of Schedule G have increased more between 1897 and 1912 than any other schedule, and Schedule G has increased as a revenue producer more rapidly than any of the other great schedules. Its percentage of increase in that period was 206 per cent.

The American farmer is asking the following questions:

Is the tariff important?

The Democratic Party answers: "Yes; it was important enough for us to make it our paramount issue in the last campaign, and we also gave it first place in our legislative program."

What was the large feature of the new tariff bill?

Removal and reduction of duties.

Did this cause large loss of revenues to the United States Treasury?

Answer. Yes.

Why, then, was it done?

To increase the competition of foreign articles in our own markets.

Why was that done?

In order to lower prices.

Against whom has there been a removal or reduction of duties to the greatest extent?

The farmers.

What class has been subjected to the greatest new competition?

The farmers.

To what extent has the farmer's competition with foreign productions increased?

On 27 leading farm products, 159 per cent.

What has been the increase in importations of manufactured or finished products?

Eight and eight-tenths per cent.

The farmer's competition has increased, therefore, as compared with the manufacturer's, in the ratio of 149 to 8⅝ per cent, a little more than 16 to 1, the old sacred ratio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SLOAN. I do.

Mr. FESS. The Secretary of Commerce states that we have an increase of importation and a decrease of exportation, which means that the country is consuming more than ever before. In other words, increase of importation and decrease of exportation is argued as an advantage to the country, because we are more prosperous and are consuming more than ever before. What is your answer to that?

Mr. SLOAN. I would dislike to answer the proposition presented by the head of the Department of Commerce, who recently, in an interview, stated that this country was greatly interested in the matter of overfatigue. If they have accomplished anything by this new tariff legislation it is overcoming the overfatigue of the American workingmen, many of whom have been released from their employment, with the prospect of many more of them being released.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. If I have the time.

Mr. FESS. Is the Nation on the road to increased wealth by selling less and buying more?

Mr. SLOAN. The answer to that is self-evident. If we purchase more than we sell, of course we are drawing on our reserve. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I promised to yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. He stated he had some documents on the subject of the legislation before the committee that he desired to submit, but he does not seem to be here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Has the gentleman any other speaker? I have a great many applications, but nobody seems to be here now.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. ADAMSON. Do you want to make a speech for the bill?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not want the gentleman to dictate.

Mr. ADAMSON. He can make one against the bill if he wants to do so.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time do you want?

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, I do not know. Say two minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Do not move to rise.

Mr. DONOVAN. I certainly will.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN]?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut for a speech, but not to make a motion.

Mr. DONOVAN. It will be a speech, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish the gentleman would wait for the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. ADAMSON. I intended to do so until Mr. BRYAN appeared. If the gentleman wants to speak for two minutes I will yield to him for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] can not control the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, I cancel that concession.

Mr. DONOVAN. I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

RATE REGULATION.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill does provide, in words, for rate regulation; but by cutting out the charge provisions of the 1910 act, and by failing to add appropriate provisions for charge to be paid to the public, this rate regulation becomes a farce.

The rate must be uniform for electric energy in a given locality, however produced. The people own a power that can produce energy, say, at $1 per unit, whatever unit you may use. The cheapest competitor to this power is steam, which costs, say, $3 per unit. This great difference in cost makes the water power very valuable to the public. If the public can utilize it, a saving of $2 per unit will be realized; but if you give away the right in a monopolistic grant to generate this power, and the individual who acquires the grant, the grantee, fixes the price of the product at $2.90—just low enough to compete with steam—the result is that the public part with a $2 value for 10 cents. Is that just? By what token or right does this grantee get all of this $1.90 of profit? No regulation on earth can reach him, for if the utilities commission fixes a rate less than $3 those depending on steam will be forced out of business and their plants and factories confiscated. The Constitution will protect them against this. The only way to prevent this injustice is to take up a part of this slack or profit in the form of a charge and return it to the Public Treasury, where it will reach the pockets of those who own the stream and the water that flows down its bed, by reducing their taxes and the burdens of government that rest upon them or by eliminating river and harbor pork.

The Keokuk Dam, at Keokuk, Iowa, illustrates the point. It is said to cost about $10 per horsepower there to generate electricity, which they sell for $20, which just undersells those who produce electricity by steam. Why should the public lose this $10—all of it—to these dam owners and operators? There should be a charge, and a substantial charge, too. Ex-Secretary Fisher has stated this proposition very clearly. I will quote from him later.

I can not understand why the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], in his colloquy with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], should take the position that the Government is without power in these matters. The Chandler-Dunbar decision has been quoted, and has been considered and debated time and time again. In the Senate Senators ROOT and BURTON and President Taft have talked about it, and, plainly interpreting it, set forth the fact that it gave to the people of this Nation these rights and these powers over these streams. Then Secretary Stimson, former Secretary of War, and Mr. Fisher, former Secretary of the Interior, and the ex-Chief Forester, Gifford Pinchot, have all discussed the matter in the hearings and other places, and they all agree that this decision did give to the Government, or rather did confirm in the Federal Government, its right and power over these streams. The very fact that it has a right to say that a dam shall go there gives to it the right to say under what conditions it shall go. If it has the right to say, "No; you can not build a dam in this stream; you can not obstruct this stream," then it has the right to name the conditions. The one goes with the other. Before the committee, when Secretary Fisher was there setting forth his views on this decision, no one successfully contradicted him. They raised some questions there. The members of the committee were all present, but it would have been ridiculous and ludicrous to question the position that he took, and anyone who will read the hearings will see that this decision does give the Federal Government the power. It has always had that power over these navigable streams, and we are not going to give it away, at least not with my consent, without exercising that right to establish conditions and restrictions.

THE ELECTRICAL FURNACE—ALUMINUM.

The argument of the gentleman from Alabama as to aluminum was very interesting, but he did not mention the fact that the aluminum goods are made by a trust and that all concessions made to the French aluminum company on the Yadkin River, in North Carolina, or to the American manufacturers on the Little Tennessee will merely increase the profits of this trust; that they will pocket all we give them and that the consumer would not be profited a penny unless we made a charge for what the public gives to them, with real regulation. Is it not more than probable that these French capitalists looked more kindly on the lax laws of North Carolina and the Little Tennessee and concluded that they could make more money by the use of child labor and 10 and 12 hours' work per day for the men and low wages than in one of the States that has changed those laws? Of course corporations seek privileges and profits, but the time has not yet arrived when I will vote to give the Aluminum Trust any special privileges. This company of gentlemen got in North Carolina free what they could not buy in their own country.

[From the Washington Post, January 15, 1913.]

ADMITS WORLD TRUST—ALUMINUM MAGNATE SAYS THAT AGREEMENT CONTROLS TRADE—HOME OFFICE IN AMERICA—ARTHUR V. DAVIS DECLARES HIS COMPANY OWNS CANADIAN FACTORY, WHICH HAS "UNDERSTANDING" WITH OTHER NATIONS—UNITED STATES EXCEPTED BECAUSE OF THE SHERMAN LAW.

The existence of an international agreement covering the aluminum industry was revealed at last night's session of the House Committee on Ways and Means. President Arthur V. Davis, of the Aluminum Co. of America, admitted that his company, the only aluminum manufactory in the United States, owned the Canadian Aluminum Co., which, in turn, had perfect agreements with all the six or seven foreign aluminum companies.

This agreement, he said, covers all the world except the United States, which, he admitted to Representative RAINEY, of Illinois, was excepted because there is a law here prohibiting it.

WANTS NO TARIFF CHANGE.

Arthur V. Davis, of Pittsburgh, testified that the company's total surplus is $12,000,000, and that the company is capitalized at $30,000,000, on which it is issuing dividends of 4 per cent on the capital stock. It has been earning between 15 and 17 per cent annually in 1910, 1911, and 1912.

Representative PALMER, of Pennsylvania, brought out that of the $30,000,000 of capital the total amount of cash actually put in was $1,860,000, the remainder representing earned profits. Mr. Davis protested against any threatened reduction of the tariff on aluminum. He said that the company was originally started as the Pittsburgh Reduction Co. in 1888, with $20,000 capital, which gradually evolved, with the use of patents whose value was put down as $700,000, into the $30,000,000 corporation.

ADMISSION AMAZES MEMBERS.

The admission of this agreement amazed members of the committee, some of whom pointed out that along with previous testimony regarding foreign trusts in other industries it presented a problem never before faced by a tariff-making committee.

Mr. Davis testified that he and his London representative wrote the agreement made by his Canadian plant with all the plants in Europe.

"I submitted the proposed form of the agreement," he said, "to Attorney General Wickersham, and when the agreement was signed I sent Mr. Wickersham a copy of it."

ACTION NOT DISCUSSED.

Mr. Davis did not say what action the Attorney General took in the matter.

"But Mr. Wickersham had no cognizance of this agreement between Canada and the rest of the world, except United States," interrupted Representative PALMER.

Mr. Davis was asked if he had a copy of the agreement. He said he had not, and said, while he personally would have no objection to filing it, he feared the other parties to it might object.

When the committee adjourned at midnight members expressed the suspicion that the Aluminum Co. of America might be interested in the $10,000,000 company being organized in North Carolina, in view of the agreement with European plants.

RAILROADS FAVOR IMPORTER.

Discussing freight rates as a factor to be considered in making a tariff, A. Cressy Morrison, of New York, representing the electric furnace manufacturing industry, told the committee that the transportation cost of heavy commodities, instead of being a protection to the domestic manufacturer, is really to his disadvantage.

The railroads grant lower rates to the foreigner on imported merchandise than they allow to the citizen of the United States.

Mr. Morrison said that with the opening of the Panama Canal the inland manufacturer of most commodities would be at a further distinct freight disadvantage with practically one-half the total population of the United States, which is his natural market.

Walter Laidlaw, of New York City, who said he represented about a dozen manufacturers of pumping machinery, but later admitted he represented the so-called Pump Trust, testified at the night session that the International Pumping Co. owned all the manufactories he mentioned

He said the International Pumping Co. had net earnings of $1,250,000 on its aggregate investment of $25,000,000, or a 5 per cent return on its capital invested. He could not recall the amount of its capital stock when pressed by Representative PALMER, of Pennsylvania, though he said he was a member of the executive committee.

The products of aluminum, the vessels made from aluminum, are manufactured by one of the closest and strictest trusts that there is in existence, and if we give them the rivers to make cheaper power and reserve no rights as to charges and regulation, it is plain, in my opinion, that it only increases the profits, that we only make for them more money, and take from the people that valuable possession that the people have in these streams.

In the Washington Herald of to-day there appears an article entitled "Water as a Resource."

The power of this water and the extent and value of water power in this country are particularly set forth and detailed in this article; but the very fact of this great power, the very fact of the great value of this utility are the reasons why we are particular about the conditions on which we part with them.

ELECTRICAL STEEL.

The illuminating statements as to electrical steel produced and to be produced in the electrical furnace were to me the most interesting portion of the able address of the gentleman from Alabama—electrical steel for steel rails, affecting greatly the safety of passengers and the economy of transportation; electrical steel for tools, for locomotive tires and axles, high-grade castings for automobile parts, and other products calling for steel of high quality. All of these things impress upon me more and more why the water-power combinations are so active and why they are working so hard to take from the people this tremendous asset.

The future of electrical steel, the uses to which high-grade steel will be put, which, it is stated, can be manufactured more economically by electricity than in any other way, only open up a vista that impresses the imagination of the people as to the future value of this asset that we are asked to part with. The United States Steel Trust is the principal manufacturer of electrical steel at this time. They are experimenting with it, and they have spent something like $300,000 to get at the science and facts in relation to the manufacture of electrical steel.

Now, then, if we give the Steel Trust a river and say, "Here, take this river, build dams in it for water power and manufacture electrical steel; take this stream and manufacture it," where do the people get any advantage of it, unless you retain hold of it in some way and lay a restraining hand upon it, so as to regulate the price of the steel or charge them for the use of the stream?

FERTILIZER AND CYANAMID PLANT.

Then we have the manufacture of fertilizer and the cyanamid plants. But in this field it is apparent that no reduction will come to the farmers if we do not compel a reduction. The possibility of increasing profits of the Fertilizer Trust does not stir me to action. I can not enthuse over the suggestion that we ought to give to this organization of interlocked capitalists the water power of the country. I want to hold this very power as a potent means of regulating the producers of fertilizer. I want to increase the charge as their profit increases. These men prate much about their patriotism, their love of the flag. Let them trust Uncle Sam to be true. They will not be wronged. Capital is timid, they say. That is not the way to put it. It is this way: Capital wants all it can get. Tell it just where its bounds are and it will not be shy at all.

We tried giving them the coal lands of Alabama and all of the South, of the East and the Central States, and much of the West, but now we refuse to part with any more mineral land for the mere asking. How did shy capital treat the people in the handling of the coal? See them shooting down innocents in glee at Mucklow, in West Virginia, and at Ludlow, in Colorado. Not so shy there. Have they reduced the price of coal to the people by letting them have the coal mines without any regulation or restraint? No; the railroads own the coal, and the railroad group own the water power, too.

But another word about West Virginia. Somebody may say I spoke too cruelly or from prejudice or something else. Here are a few lines from the dignified report of two United States Senators appointed to investigate that situation:

So that in investigating the seventh division of the resolution the committee has been led to the belief that the private ownership of these great properties, with the attendant human greed, is the underlying cause of the conditions, such as the record shows existed in the Paint and Cabin Creek coal fields.

Give them the water power free, eh? Well, I guess we will not do any such thing, and the men who try to do it are going to be censured by the American people, and they will be rightly censured.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said in his speech:

The gentlemen who are obstructing legislation of this kind upon the ground that they are conservationists I regret to say, in my judgment, are obstructionists against the best interests of the people of the United States.

We are obstructing, if obstructing at all, and I hope we are in the interest of the people, of agriculture, of industry, and are promoting the well-being of the people of this country. The gentleman from Alabama also said:

And I wish to say, in passing, that gentlemen who expect to make political capital for themselves by throwing obstructions in the way of honest legislation to develop the great water power of this country, when these facts become known to the agricultural classes of this country, will have a day of reckoning at their own homes.

By the term "who expect to make political capital for themselves" the gentleman evidently has the idea that, for the present at least, it is popular, or that we think it popular, to oppose such legislation as this. And it is popular in my State. The people in every little town and at every crossroad have heard about how it will ruin the country and destroy all industry to refuse to give away the franchises and the public rights. But they have learned to call the men who preach that doctrine reactionaries, adherents of the cause of greed, ballot-box stuffers, bosses, convention thieves, and they refuse to follow their teachings any more. They think for themselves. They bend every energy to own their own franchises. They are proud of the Government forest reserves. They own an interest in them, and they look with contempt upon those who gave the vast timber areas away to the Weyerhaeusers and the railroads. You can not get them to applaud when you moan about the Government timber tied up. They do not grieve about the Alaska coal that was reserved. They do not curse Pinchot; they hail him a hero. They do not damn the man who is the author of the new light and is the genius of present-day conservation and progress; they vote for him for President by 50,000 majority.

If these franchise seekers are not satisfied with a 50-year permit, with the understanding that we will pay them the cost of the dam and the value of their other structures at the end of the time, let them go to Canada. We can take care of ourselves in this country.

I do not want to be caustic or personal in my remarks. I highly respect the gentleman from Alabama, both for his ability and his affable and kindly disposition, but I do believe there is one part of his remarks he had better have left unsaid.

Here is what I refer to:

In the arid regions of the West it is water, not land, which measures agricultural production. In the cotton fields of the South it is fertilizer, not land, that measures production.

An examination of the summary of appropriations made by Congress for western land irrigation and reclamation discloses the following:

Early irrigation surveys	$350,000.00
Reclamation fund	79,450,438.53
Authorized bond issue	20,000,000.00
Expended by Geological Survey	4,500,000.00
Expended by Department of Agriculture	956,000.00
Expended by or through Office of Indian Affairs	10,797,316.29
Total	116,003,754.82

These contributions of the Federal Government by these appropriations in aid of the reclamation of the arid lands of the West are most wisely made, for Congress can make no appropriations and pass no laws so useful to the country as those appropriations and laws which contribute to the increase of our food crops.

What appropriations has Congress made, what encouragement has the Government given to the increased production and cheaper production of fertilizers, so indispensably necessary to the food crops of the farmers of this country from Massachusetts to California and from Maine to Texas? The agricultural fertilizer bill in the United States during the single year 1909 amounted to $114,882,541, and the fertilizer bill for 1909 of the 11 Southern States—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas—was alone $63,992,626.

Is it sound, is it sane, that out of the Federal Treasury the enormous expenditures of public funds for the reclamation of the arid lands of the West be continued—and they should be—and Congress refuse to pass constructive dam legislation that will invite and protect private capital, to be invested at its sole expense in the construction of dams for the joint improvement of navigation and development of power in the navigable streams of the country, which power will be largely employed in the manufacture of fertilizers which are just as necessary to increase the food crops and cotton crops, especially of the Southern States, as water is necessary to the production of food crops on the arid lands of the West?

Let the gentleman first of all bear in mind that the water power of the West is in the hands of the Government and is administered under the strictest rules by the departments in control. The gentleman knows the provisions of the Lane-Ferris bill—not a part of our water power but practically all of it. And we have water power out there—very much more of it than there is in the South and East. We are getting permits for our municipalities, lighting our cities, heating and lighting our homes, running our industries, not at 12 cents per kilowatt hour, the preposterous and outrageous price named by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], in his interruption of his colleague, as the rate at which his people are fleeced in Alabama, but at from 3 cents to 8 cents. The Puget Sound Navy Yard has a contract for electric current at 1½ cents per kilowatt hour. The Government is not asked by the people of the West to give their water power to the New York bankers and brokers, and there would be almost a revolution if any such procedure were attempted. We want the Government to continue to administer it, and to reserve it when it is right to reserve it.

But of this $116,003,754.82 bill of particulars that the gentleman presented, $99,450,438.53 was for reclamation, every cent of which the Government still owns as an investment, and $5,806,000 for surveys and by the Department of Agriculture. It takes some self-possession for a Member of this House to attempt to chide the men of the West with the statement "Look what we spent to survey your lands out West, and then the rest of the bill you spent on the Indians."

That is a big bill—$116,000,000. Why do you not complain some about the 260,000,000 acres of land that Congress gave away to the railroads and then $5,000,000,000 worth of timber that passed into private hands on the very kind of a flimflam by which it is now sought to give the water power to Canadian fertilizer makers and the French Aluminum Trust, and others? Oh, that $116,000,000 is a mere bagatelle. You spent that legitimately. You squandered the billions.

If the gentleman from Alabama wants fertilizer for the farmers in the South, let him come in here with a proposition to build a dam on any Government stream and establish a plant that will furnish the fertilizer to farmers at cost. He will have no trouble getting a waiver of cost from the Government for power in such a case. That is what we proposed and carried through with the valuable assistance of the gentleman from Alabama in Alaska. We wanted transportation at low prices, and we will have a Government railroad to do the job at cost.

But with all your squandering of the resources of the Government in the West and in Alaska, still there is where the public treasure is. What does the Government own in the South and East except the water power which these gentlemen are so anxious to unload? The Government owns a billion dollars worth of timber in the Western States. But that is only a suggestion of all the tremendous and inestimable wealth of mine and land and water power in the West and in Alaska. Our slogan is "Develop"; yours, "Give it away." Which is the better policy for the people?

My opinion is that the gentlemen who vote for this bill are the ones who will have to render account in the days to come.

Why has the chairman of this great committee introduced and brought forward as an emergency measure this particular bill? Did the gentleman believe the present law insufficient or inadequate to safeguard the public interest and did he desire more stringent regulation? Not at all. He stated in his speech the other day that the law was already too drastic to be effective, and he deplored the fact that but few of the permits granted under that law were put into operation.

THE NEW LIGHT.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] referred in disparaging terms to a new light which had interfered with the operations of certain men who have heretofore received grants from Congress for dam sites for water power, and he plainly intimated that the same new light was still in the way. The new light first appeared on April 13, 1908, when President Roosevelt demanded the attention of Congress with his veto message on the bill for construction of a dam across Rainy River. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 42, pt. 5, p. 4698.)

The new light was composed of five rays, summarized by the President as follows:

First. There should be a limited or carefully guarded grant in the nature of an option or opportunity afforded within reasonable time for development of plans and for execution of the project.

Second. Such a grant or concession should be accompanied in the act making the grant by a provision expressly making it the duty of the designated official to annul the grant if the work is not begun or plans are not carried out in accordance with the authority granted.

Third. It should also be the duty of some designated official to see to it that in approving the plans the maximum development of the navigation and power is assured, or at least that in making the plans these may not be so developed as ultimately to interfere with the better utilization of the water or complete development of the power.

Fourth. There should be a license fee or charge which, though small or nominal at the outset, can in the future be adjusted so as to secure a control in the interest of the public.

Fifth. Provision should be made for the termination of the grant or privilege at a definite time, leaving to future generations the power or authority to renew or extend the concession in accordance with the conditions which may prevail at that time.

On April 13—one month later—the new light was again flashed in the faces of certain gentlemen by the President in the form of a letter to the Senate Committee on Commerce, the body of which letter is as follows:

Numerous bills granting water rights in conformity with the general act of June 21, 1906, have been introduced during the present session of Congress, and some of these have already passed. While the general act authorizes the limitation and restriction of water rights in the public interest, and would seem to warrant making a reasonable charge for the benefits conferred, those bills which have come to my attention do not seem to guard the public interests adequately in these respects. The effect of granting privileges such as are conferred by these bills, as said in a recent message, "taken together with rights already acquired under State laws, would be to give away properties of enormous value. Through lack of foresight we have formed the habit of granting without compensation extremely valuable rights, amounting to monopolies, on navigable streams and on the public domain. The repurchase at great expense of water rights thus carelessly given away without return has already begun in the East, and before long will be necessary in the West also. No rights granting water power should be granted to any corporation in perpetuity, but only for a length of time sufficient to allow them to conduct their business profitably. A reasonable charge should, of course, be made for valuable rights and privileges which they obtain from the National Government. The values for which this charge is made will ultimately, through the natural growth and orderly development of our population and industries, reach enormous amounts. A fair share of the increase should be safeguarded for the benefit of the people, from whose labor it springs. The proceeds thus secured, after the cost of administration and improvement has been met, should naturally be devoted to the development of our inland waterways." Accordingly I have decided to sign no bills hereafter which do not provide specifically for the right to fix and make a charge and for a definite limitation in time of the rights conferred.

On January 15, 1909, President Roosevelt vetoed House bill 17707, to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River in Stone County, Mo. The five rays of the new light were not only flashed but were focused and burnt into the eyes of some Members of Congress who, having eyes to see, see not. To make sure, a sixth ray was added, as follows:

Sixth. The license should be forfeited upon proof that the licensee has joined in any conspiracy or unlawful combination in restraint of trade, as is provided for grants of coal land in Alaska by the act of May 28, 1908.

The President further stated in his veto message:

To give away without conditions this, one of the greatest of our resources, would be an act of folly. If we are guilty of it, our children will be forced to pay an annual return upon a capitalization based upon the highest prices which "the traffic will bear." They will find themselves face to face with powerful interests intrenched behind the doctrine of "vested rights" and strengthened by every defense which money can buy and the ingenuity of able corporation lawyers can devise. Long before that time they may, and very probably will, have become a consolidated interest, controlled from the great financial centers, dictating the terms upon which the citizen can conduct his business or earn his livelihood, and not amenable to the wholesome check of local opinion.

* * * * * * *

THE NEW LIGHT WORE GLASSES AND HAD BIG TEETH.

I will sign no bill granting a privilege of this character which does not contain the substance of these conditions. I consider myself bound, as far as exercise of my Executive power will allow, to do for the people, in prevention of monopoly of their resources, what I believe they would do for themselves if they were in a position to act. Accordingly I shall insist upon the conditions mentioned above not only in acts which I sign, but also in passing upon plans for use of water power presented to the executive departments for action. The imposition of conditions has received the sanction of Congress in the general act of 1906, regulating the construction of dams in navigable waters, which authorizes the imposing of "such conditions and stipulations as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get through with this new-light proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better rise. We have heard that a thousand times.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will hear it a thousand times more; it is right, and it will not down.

Mr. ADAMSON. The line of talk that we have just heard has been familiar to us for 15 years, and it is due not, in my judgment to dishonesty, but to ignorance.

Mr. BRYAN I suppose the gentleman refers to that which I have just read from President Roosevelt. That is a new term to apply to him.

Mr. ADAMSON. After he wrote that letter he and his advisers agreed with Mr. STEVENS and his subcommittee for the amendment of 1910, and then they went back on the amendment after it was made.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] says it is unconstitutional. I wish I had more time on that, Mr. Chairman, but I will avail myself of the privilege of extending in the RECORD.

The gentleman blames President Roosevelt for the trouble that the franchise getters incurred while Roosevelt was in Africa and on all other subsequent events. Surely there is some truth in that, for a good authority, which I will cite presently, said the new light of Theodore Roosevelt had "awakened the American conscience."

The act of 1910, which is the present general dam act, is evidently objectionable to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. That gentleman gives the following as a portion of a "strictly accurate" statement of a promise made to President Roosevelt to "violate the Constitution" by agreeing—

That a supplemental act should be passed to the existing law that should extend the powers of Congress beyond those we got under the Constitution. It was that promise we kept in framing the act of 1910.

HIS PICTURE TO THE WALL, BUT—A CABINET ROW.

Matters proceeded smoothly for a season, and President Taft went on signing grants under Mr. STEVENS's "unconstitutional act of 1910"; but "the new light" again penetrated the gloom, and lo, a Cabinet row—Stimson, Secretary of War, and Fisher, Secretary of the Interior, had succeeded Dickinson and Ballinger. Certain constitutionalists had not properly estimated the power and force of the new light. The Chief Forester had been fired, but "where is now the merry party"? The new light forced its way into the gloom of the last administration, and we had a Taft veto for the Coosa River project.

HAS PRESIDENT WILSON PERCEIVED THE NEW LIGHT?

I wonder if the gentleman from Georgia has ever asked President Wilson if "the new light" has reached his administration. Will he veto such bills if they come up to him? I imagine he has said, "Yes," if such a question has been asked and the necessity for a new enactment in the form of a new general dam act has become apparent. For it was Woodrow Wilson, the historian, who, in speaking of the Roosevelt administration, said:

All must admit that the chief legacy of this remarkable administration to the people of the United States is one of ideas.

And—

One can * * * agree with Gov. Hughes, of New York, in characterizing it as "an administration which has impressed the American people with the necessity for the correction of obvious evils and has stirred the American conscience."

I believe that the new light is still a vital force in this country and that the American conscience is still on the job. So I have no doubt that President Wilson would likewise veto such grants, and the gentleman from Georgia knows that he would, and that Secretary Lane and Secretary Garrison also would advise such vetoes.

NO NEW LIGHT IN THIS BILL UNLESS AMENDED.

But surely the gentleman from Georgia knows there is none of the new light in this pending bill. To enact it into law would be to back up 10 years and practically destroy what has been accomplished in the past. It is absurd to think that the Members of this House will pass this bill in its present form. The gentleman from Georgia has insisted that this is an administration bill, approved by the President; but I will say that I can not understand the position of the administration. There must be a mistake somewhere. If the administration has approved this bill, I believe that approval was given without fully understanding the subject and will be withdrawn.

EVOLUTION OF AN ADMINISTRATION DAM BILL.

On the 19th of last February the report was given out that a bill said to have been proposed by the Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison, had the approval of the administration, but when the letter of the able Secretary disclosed the provisions of the bill it was found that the passion for local self-government and the desire to promote and encourage hydroelectrical development had caused the bill to lose all the provisions for real Federal control, and that its adoption would place the water-power interests in a place of safety between the State and the Federal Governments. The new light again shone forth, and Secretary Garrison stated very plainly that he was mistaken and, according to press reports, he let it be known that his approval of the plan had been given in error. Then the other day the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] presented administration bill No. 2. I say this is an awful backdown, and that Congress can not think of passing it, and I now hear rumors persistent of administration bill No. 3, which carries certain amendments which were passed around on Wednesday afternoon of this week. But I believe administration bill No. 3 will not be satisfactory to this House. I know it is not satisfactory to me. I do not see any reason or excuse for liberalizing the general dam act as is proposed by this legislation. I am fully aware that there is a clamor for this kind of legislation on the part of the water-power interests, and they make the argument that if the law is not liberal, timid capital will not be enticed to build the dams. For my part, I had rather go a little slower and protect the public interest. It is very easy to give away rights and franchises, and it is very hard to recover them when they once get into private hands.

Upon investigation it will generally be discovered that there is no truth in the claims of these interests that honest, legitimate development is being retarded by regulation and careful regard by Congress of the people's rights. Let us consider some of these claims, and I gladly acknowledge the aid of Mr. Slattery, secretary of the conservation association, in compiling much of this data.

1. THAT FEDERAL CONTROL IS RETARDING POWER DEVELOPMENT.

This is totally disproved by the progress of power development under permit on the national forests. The power permits of the Forest Service contain the very provisions for a 50-year franchise, a charge for the use of the power site, publicity, and prompt development, which the power interests claim are unreasonable and impracticable. So large has been the demand for privileges on national forests under these permits that on October 1, 1913, there were 78 water powers developed, 30 under construction, and 76 for which permits have been taken out during the past two years under conditions requiring prompt development. The total capacity of the water powers now under permit on national forests is 1,090,000 horsepower, reckoned on minimum stream flow. The actual capacity is not less than twice as much. Thus the total horsepower under permit for development in national forests is not far from one-third the total present development of water power in the United States.

The Forest Service has granted permits within the last four months for an aggregate power development of 340,000 horsepower at minimum stream flow, equivalent to at least 700,000 horsepower of actual development.

2. THAT THE CONCENTRATION OF WATER-POWER CONTROL IS NOT INCREASING OR THAT IT DOES NOT EXIST.

Concentration of private control of water power is the dominant feature of the water-power situation, as the following facts show:

In 1908, 13 groups of interests controlled 1,827,000 horsepower.

In 1911, 10 groups of interests controlled 3,270,000 horsepower.

In 1913, 10 groups of interests controlled 6,267,000 horsepower.

Thus the amount of private control of water power has practically doubled in the last two years.

When we compare the private control of developed and undeveloped water powers shown above with the total amount of developed water power in the United States we get these results:

In 1908, total development 5,300,000 horsepower, and the equivalent of 33 per cent in concentrated private control.

In 1911, total development 6,000,000 horsepower, and the equivalent of 55 per cent in concentrated private control.

In 1913, total development 7,000,000 horsepower, and the equivalent of 65 per cent in concentrated private control.

When we turn to individual States we find the results shown in the following table, which gives for each of the States enumerated the name or names of the leading power companies and the percentage controlled by them of the total developed commercial power in the State.

State.	Power company.	Percentage of total commercial power controlled.
California	Pacific Gas & Electric Co.; Western Power Co.	42
Washington	Washington Water Power Co.; Puget Sound Light & Power Co.	65
Oregon	Portland Railway, Light & Power Co.	54
Utah	Utah Security Corporation; Utah Power Co.	60
Montana	Montana Power Co.	80
Colorado	Colorado Power Co.	60
North Carolina	Carolina Power & Light Co.	50
South Carolina	Southern Power Co.	80
Georgia	Georgia Railway Power Co.; Georgia Power Co.	55
Alabama	Alabama Light, Power & Traction Co.	96
Tennessee	Tennessee Railway, Light & Power Co.; Chattanooga-Tennessee Power Co.	90
Minnesota	Northern States Power Co.; Northwestern Power Co.	50
Michigan	Commonwealth Power, Light & Railway Co.	42
Maine	Central Maine Power Co.; Cumberland County Power & Light Co.	45
Vermont	New England Power Co.	55

Thus in 15 of the great power States private control of developed commercial power, usually in the hands of a single company, averages 61 per cent. The total capitalization of these controlling power companies in these 15 States is approximately half a billion dollars.

3. THAT DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWERS IN PRIVATE CONTROL IS KEEPING PACE WITH THE GROWTH OF THIS CONTROL.

In 1911 10 groups of interests controlled 3,270,000 horsepower, of which 1,821,000 was developed and 1,449,000 was undeveloped.

In 1913 10 groups of interests controlled 6,267,000 horsepower, of which 2,711,000 was developed and 3,556,000 was undeveloped.

Thus in two years the great power interests have increased their control of power held undeveloped more than twice as fast as they have increased their power development.

When we compare for 1908 and 1913 the total developed water power in the United States with the concentrated control of water powers developed and undeveloped we get these results:

In 1908 the total developed water power was 5,300,000 horsepower and the total power developed and undeveloped in the control of the 13 greatest groups of power interests was 1,800,000.

In 1913 the total developed water power was 7,000,000 horsepower and the total power developed and undeveloped in the control of 10 great groups of interests was 6,300,000.

Thus concentration of ownership of water power in the United States has increased in the last five years about seven times faster than power development.

Three western power corporations alone control about 1,000,000 undeveloped horsepower.

4. THAT IT IS DIFFICULT TO INTEREST CAPITAL IN POWER DEVELOPMENT BECAUSE OF HIGH FINANCIAL RISK AND LOW RETURNS.

During the last 10 years the net earnings of gas and electric companies have never dropped below 8 per cent on the securities issued, although these have increased by 110 per cent, or double the railroad expansion. (Henry L. Doherty & Co., bankers, New York, Apr. 21, 1913.)

The relative safety of gas and electric companies' securities compared with other securities is shown by the following figures:

Average annual amount of securities in receivers' hands per $100 of outstanding securities.

Gas and electric companies		$0.37
National banks—
Insolvent	$0.32
Voluntary liquidation	1.61
		1.93
Railroads		1.84
Industrials		2.07

This shows that gas and electric companies are about as safe as national banks. For the last 10 years gas and electric companies have earned an average net return of $8.45 per $100 of outstanding securities, industrials $7.79, and railroads $4.25. Thus gas and electric companies have larger net earnings than the other classes. Their security is also greater, since their receivership risk is $0.37, against $2.07 for industrials and $1.84 for railroads.

Edward B. Lee, a recognized authority on investment securities, in "A year's review of public utilities," Moody's Magazine, January, 1913, states that 57 public-utility companies raised $469,656,000 through the sale of securities in 1912.

Mr. Lee also states:

The year 1912 saw the greatest spread of the holding-company idea and of the consolidation of public-utility companies and properties—

And goes on to say—

There are those who believe that the development of public-utility properties and the extension of their financing has gone a step too far.

5. THAT MANY POWER DEVELOPMENTS HAVE BEEN "GRAVEYARDS" FOR THE HOPES AND CAPITAL OF THEIR PROMOTERS.

Continuing, Mr. Lee says:

The record of hydroelectric companies in the United States has been, on the whole, an excellent one. There have been, of course, some failures owing to unfortunate selection of territory to be served and of water-power sites to be utilized, to faulty construction of dams and reservoirs, and to bad financing; but the losses of investors have been relatively small.

6. THAT RATES CHARGED BY POWER INTERESTS FOR WATER POWER COULD NOT REASONABLY BE LOWER.

Testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs given by Gen. Francis V. Greene, president of the Niagara, Lockport & Ontario Power Co., and by Mr. C. H. Hammond, corporation counsel, Buffalo, brought out the fact that Buffalo pays $30 per horsepower for hydroelectric power generated at Niagara, and Rochester pays $25, while Toronto pays $17.45, and Hamilton, also in Canada, pays $18.55 per horsepower.

In Chicago, St. Paul, Spokane, Pittsburgh, Portland, Providence, Richmond, Reading, and San Antonio the base rate for power for lighting purposes charged by private companies is 10 cents per kilowatt hour. In Cleveland, where the municipality operates its own power plant, the maximum rate is 3 cents and the minimum 1 cent. Pasadena, which used to pay 15 cents per kilowatt hour under private ownership of its power plant, is now running its own plant and selling power for 5 cents per kilowatt hour, and has already earned enough in profits to pay for the plant.

Seattle now operates its own municipal light and power plant, with the result that power costs the city and the consumer less than half what it cost when the power plant was privately owned and operated.

The Mississippi River Power Co., which operated the Keokuk Dam, has already sold less than one-third of the developed power for a sum representing a return of 5 per cent on its entire investment of $20,000,000.

We can not afford to forget the vast numbers of the people who must furnish the money to stimulate these water-power interests. The promoters that are in the habit of finding a snap and then forming a company will be heard to complain. Water-power development has been going on with amazing rapidity. This talk about embarrassed millionaires and timid water-power financiers is not borne out by the facts.

The Electrical World has made public some estimates of the rate of growth of the central-station business for March, 1914, compared with March, 1913, for various groups of States, based upon actual official returns from nearly 100 companies, which represent between them something over one-half of the entire light and power industry. These data show the following rates of increase on (1) revenue from the sale of energy and (2) total energy output of stations in kilowatt-hours: Middle Atlantic States, 6.1 per cent and 7.5 per cent; South Atlantic, 11.3 and 22.8; Central, 11.2 and 12.8; New England, 7.1 and 7.7. For the whole country it is closely estimated that the gross revenue from the sale of energy increased from $29,500,000 in March, 1913, to $31,913,000 in March, 1914, and the total energy output from 1,142,000,000 kilowatt-hours to 1,257,250,000.

THE WATER-POWER PROBLEM.

The water-power problem will sooner or later be brought home to every man, woman, and child, and home in this Nation. Within a few years the use of power will become a daily problem to the man on the farm, the woman in the home, and to the workingman in the shop. It does not take vision or imagination of great length to see the day when electric power, on account of the prohibitive cost of coal and wood, due to the depleted supply, will be the great factor in the power world. Even to-day, in manufacturing, water power is beginning to become a prime factor. This is shown by the fact that in six Western States 60 per cent of the power used in manufacturing is generated by falling water. When we consider the inestimable advantage of electricity over other power, we see clearly that water power will easily override all competitors.

WATER POWER IN THE HOME.

The use of electricity, generated by water power, is rapidly becoming an important economic factor in the home. Its widespread use for lighting and heating purposes is common knowledge. But in the near future will come the general operation of labor-saving devices in the home by electricity. In the West many communities have solved their servant problem, to say nothing of a reduced cost, by the installation of electric labor-saving machinery. A western governor at a recent meeting of the house of governors, to illustrate the widespread use of water power in his section, said: We have it on the farms, where we cook and heat and light by electricity, because our water powers are so cheap that we can afford to do it. In my home we have not had a fire to cook with in seven years nor a fire to heat our bath water and water for domestic use, and we do our cooking, make our ice cream, and churn the butter, do the washing and ironing, and the girls even wash the dishes by electricity. Within a few years this illustration will aptly apply to every section of this country.

CONSERVATION VERSUS DISSIPATION OF WATER POWER.

The keynote of the conservation policy with reference to water power is that our water powers should be controlled by the public. The reckless granting of power sites in perpetuity and without restrictions has been a sin of this generation which will be visited many times over on generations to come. The heedless giving of these franchises by both State and Nation to private corporations has been partly due to the failure of the public servants to safeguard this inestimable resource. There is some truth in the plea of ignorance, since it was only a few years ago that the value of a power site was realized. But there is no excuse for the frittering away of these valuable resources in this time of our Nation's life, with the ills of monopoly pressing us on every side. We must awaken to the true situation or there will be no use to lock the stable—the horsepower will be gone. Democrats ought to recognize the following words of William J. Bryan:

I know of nothing that nearer approaches the system of landlordism in Europe than the proposed giving away of these mountain streams in perpetuity to great syndicates, that through the years and generations to come could extract their toll from the toiling people. Therefore when we consider the use of these mountain streams the first thing we must decide is that there shall be no perpetual grant of water power. Who can tell what that right will be worth a hundred years from now? Look back 25 years. Who could have estimated then the value of a water-power site to-day? Within the last quarter of a century we have had a development of electricity that makes it possible to carry for hundreds of miles power generated by falling water. If you visit Canada you will find in the Province of Ontario great towers carrying for hundreds of miles the power generated at Niagara Falls. We are now in the very beginning of the use of electricity. What criminal folly for this generation to barter away sacred rights of posterity to syndicates and corporations. So it seems to me that one of the important questions to be decided in the conservation of our natural resources is that the principle of monopoly shall not be permitted in this country under a guise in any form. Let us insist that wherever or whenever a franchise is granted it shall be granted for a term of years, and that term shall not be so long but that we can reasonably estimate to-day the value of it at the end of the term. No other principles are tenable in the discussion of this subject.

DEVELOPED HORSEPOWER AND AVAILABLE SUPPLY.

The report of the Bureau of the Census made for the National Conservation Commission (1908) estimated 5,356,000 horsepower developed in the United States by water power. The Bureau of Corporations report of March 14, 1912, on water-power development estimates about 6,016,127 developed horsepower. According to this report, about 30,000,000 horsepower is developed by gas, water, and coal. It will therefore be seen that one-fifth of the horsepower in the country to-day is generated by water power.

In 1908 the United States Geological Survey estimated the potential water power of the country, minimum, 36,916,250, and maximum, 66,518,500.

It is estimated by experts that the waters of the country, if stored properly, would generate 200,000,000 horsepower, in addition to preventing floods. Power developed from storage reservoirs at the headwaters of our great rivers, like the Mississippi River, has unlimited possibilities. The late Dr. McGee, the most eminent authority on the subject of waters in the country, said of our storage-power possibilities:

It exceeds our entire mechanical power now in use, and would operate every mill, drive every spindle, propel ever boat, run every car, and light every city, town, and village in the country.

HAVE WE A WATER-POWER MONOPOLY, AND HOW?

If we should ask the average citizen this question, he would likely answer in the negative. Many doubtless have never heard of a water-power monopoly in their community, although it may already have fastened itself upon them. Let us look, for instance, at California—the State of the greatest water-power development. Upon investigation we find four large companies holding sites capable of developing 570,000 horsepower, of which only about 200,000 horsepower has been developed. This is practically a monopoly of a State's water power, when we consider the Bureau of Corporations' total water-power estimate of 1,168,216 developed horsepower. These corporations are also holding an enormous amount of power undeveloped.

But let us look at other States and see if concentration has been so widespread. In Washington we find two companies controlling 101,000 horsepower, or 75 per cent of the developed power, while in Michigan one company controls 73 per cent, or 52,000 horsepower of that State. Similar conditions exist in Montana, Colorado, Georgia, Alabama, Missouri, and New York.

"That is all right," some one will say, "to talk of these local water powers being under the domination of monopoly. We have heard lots of talk like that before, but I am from Missouri. Who are they? That is the meat of the question." All we will have to do is to put the Government behind these statements and say: There are two power fields in California—one around San Francisco, the other around Los Angeles. In the San Francisco region the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. control the water-power situation, embracing 30 counties, more than 200 cities and communities, and about two-thirds of the people of the State live in the area they serve. This company owns 118,343 horsepower and the electric and traction systems in more than 40 cities. In Washington the eastern part is largely controlled by the Pacific Coast Power Co. In the State of Montana the Butte Electric Power Co. controls 69,260 horsepower and the United Missouri River Power Co. 65,000; together they control 134,260, or about 45 per cent of the entire development. In Colorado the Central Power Co. alone controls all the developed water powers in the vicinity of Denver, and out of 72,000 horsepower developed in the State controls 47,000. This company also controls 50,000 undeveloped. In South Carolina we find the Southern Power Co. controls 101,000 horsepower, or 75 per cent of the State's power, with 73,000 undeveloped horsepower; while in Georgia the Georgia Power Co. controls 73,550 horsepower, or 58 per cent of that in the State. In Michigan 73 per cent of power is controlled by the Commonwealth Power Railway & Light Co., or 51,800 horsepower, and 71,000 undeveloped.

It is true that concentration is more acute in the West than any other section.

IN CONTROL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

However, in the national forests there is about 14,000,000 undeveloped horsepower; on the public lands there is estimated to be 10,000,000 horsepower, and on irrigation projects about 56,690 horsepower. This is 15,000,000 horsepower now under Federal control which should never be allowed to go the way of the other great water powers of the East and West.

IS A WATER-POWER TRUST IN FORMATION?

There may be a question whether or not we have a power trust to-day, but there is no denying the fact that it is on its way. If we look around, we find 10 large groups of water-power companies which are domineered to a great extent by the "General Electric interests." The General Electric absolutely controls 83,000 developed horsepower, controls by interlocking stock ownership or directors 419,000 developed horsepower, and controls through the community of directors 437,000, a total of 939,000 developed horsepower, or 15 per cent of the developed power in the United States, and 641,600 horsepower, or about 24 per cent of the undeveloped power reported by concerns owning developed power. The "Stone & Webster interests," the other large cooperative combine, own or strongly influence 278,000 horsepower, and, undeveloped, 641,000. In other words, we have these two allied interests alone controlling 2,499,600 horsepower. Is this not very near a trust in itself?

A water-power trust, granting it has not arrived, will be the greatest menace to the public welfare that we have yet experienced. Of the dangers of concentration, Senator BURTON has said:

Besides its enormous magnitude, this industry will become fundamental to many other industries which depend upon water power for their operation and success. The possibility of a control of the business of the country through the agency of water power is more imminent than any other form of control ever attempted in the history of human endeavor.

AN EXAMPLE OF THE OLD METHOD.

The Stone & Webster interests own the great Mississippi River Power Co., across the Mississippi River near Keokuk, Iowa, which is to generate 300,000 horsepower. Congress granted a perpetual franchise in 1905 to construct this dam without restrictions, except that certain locks and appurtenant works should be constructed. The project has recently been completed at a cost of $20,000,000. The dam, which will back the waters of the Mississippi for 65 miles, is eight-tenths of a mile long, of monolithic concrete, with 199 concrete arches, and a power house 1,710 feet long. Two locks on this project are of equal width of those at Panama, namely, 110 feet, and are 400 feet long. Without any regard as to the cost of constructing these locks and whether it would be sufficient remuneration to the Government for the privilege, Congress gave away this valuable right forever and for nothing. An investigation of the franchise, which Congress freely granted, should have been made by Congress. In view of its failure to do so, this news item of a recent date is interesting:

The Union Electric Light & Power Co. of St. Louis has contracted from the Mississippi Power Co. for the sale of 60,000 horsepower from this plant to be delivered in that city at $20 per kilowatt per year to consumers.

WATER POWER AND CONGRESS.

Since 1789 Congress has authorized the building of about 100 dams by special private bills. To-day 50 per cent of these dam sites are in the hands of large water-power interests. This is convincing evidence that these sites were secured primarily for monopolistic purposes. A Senator well summed up the situation in these words:

Special interests, in order to reap the harvests of the last of our great natural resources, have been grabbing for these water-power sites with a greed hardly paralleled in the history of this country, which has already suffered enough from exploitation of our natural resources.

But some will say, "Well, of course that happened many years ago, when Congress didn't understand the value of this great resource as we all do to-day." Well, just let us see. On February 24, 1911 (act 342), a right was granted by Congress to the Ozark Power & Water Co. to build a dam across the White River in Missouri. This company had been incorporated under the laws of Missouri on January 1, 1911, with authorized capital stock of $5,000, 48 of the 50 shares being held by one man. Three months after Congress passed this legislation the company increased its capital to $875,000, and nine months after its capital stock was increased to $2,000,000. This company is to-day rapidly absorbing all the local power companies in this section. The report of the Missouri Waterway Commission (p. 35, 1912) says of this same company:

It could not be learned by this commission at what price this electric energy would be delivered to the power consumer. Providing the electric power is sold to the ultimate consumer at a price which will be just a little under that of coal-produced power, it is easily seen that the profits from this water-power investment will be exceedingly large. At $40 per horsepower per annum, which, because of the high cost of producing power by means of coal and steam at Springfield and Joplin, would not be an excessive price, the annual gross income from this one water-power development would be $400,000. However, if more than the minimum power were realized the annual income would greatly exceed this amount. The promoters of the project have estimated that the annual expense, including the maintenance of transmission lines and the operation of the power plant, will not exceed $50,000. This therefore leaves a net income of $350,000 on an investment of less than $2,000,000, which is 16⅔ per cent profit. It is very likely, however, that the gross income is underestimated and the actual expenses overestimated, and therefore possible that the profits will be much greater than indicated.

Congress granted this franchise with no consideration of its worth or the speculative feature involved.

I have already referred to the fact that President Roosevelt in his veto of the James River bill, on January 19, 1909, called to the attention of Congress its failure to properly protect the public interest in these grants. But in 1909 an omnibus bill was reported favorably which contained this same grant on the James River. The grant became a law and a few months after was transferred to the power monopoly of Missouri by the grantees.

CONTROL IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

It may be of interest to see how they are handling this water-power problem in other countries. In the Province of Victoria, Australia, licenses are granted only for a limited period at an average charge of $5 per horsepower per annum.

The New South Wales Government retains the ownership of all land 66 feet each side of all water fronts and courses, and taxes and leases the water power.

In Switzerland, in 1908, an amendment to the constitution was adopted granting the Federal Government control of all franchises, and to-day about 70 per cent of all power generated in Switzerland is owned by public authorities or under public control through stock ownership. Many cities have municipal power plants.

In France permits are granted for development purposes on navigable streams on a rental basis.

Italy grants concession for water power not longer than 30 years on an annual rental.

Ontario reserves the right on each side of all water fronts and transmits power to municipalities at cost.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the country that there are some correct views on the Pacific coast, and I have sent to the Clerk's desk a letter to show the concurrence of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce and the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce in this bill, and I ask that it be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WORKS obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. I was going to move to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill; but, of course, I would not make that motion so as to interfere with the remarks of the Senator from California. However, as soon as he has concluded his remarks I shall make that privileged motion.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have already expressed my views in somewhat extended remarks made by me a few days ago on the three trust bills that are now before the Senate. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in any further extended remarks upon the bill that is now immediately under consideration.

I have contended in the Senate for a long time and on different occasions that the only effective way to deal with the trusts is by specific provisions against wrongful offenses committed. We have legislated for a long time against combinations, conspiracies, and monopolies, but after all it is not the monopoly that offends or injures competition, nor is it the combination or conspiracy. It is the specific acts done in restraint of trade after that combination or monopoly has been formed or is in existence.

I listened with a good deal of interest to what was said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in commenting upon the Standard Oil case, the Tobacco Trust case, and others of a like kind. I want to say to the Senate that the adjudication of those cases and the results which followed did more to satisfy my mind of the inadequacy and inefficiency of the Sherman antitrust law than anything that has happened. What was said by the court in laying down the principles involved in the controversy was interesting. They were correct principles that ought to control the conduct of business. But, after all, the only thing that was accomplished or attempted to be accomplished as the result of that litigation was to dissolve the combinations that had been formed, resulting, as it was claimed, in each case as a monopoly of the business in which these different corporations were engaged.

Now, what harm resulted to the Standard Oil Co. by the decree that was rendered in that case or its enforcement? Absolutely none. Instead of affecting the value of the stock of the corporation the stock went up soon after that time.

So far as anyone can see there has been no material change in the method of conducting business by the Standard Oil Co. since that time. The same thing may be said respecting the Tobacco Trust. We have simply attempted by the decree in that case and its enforcement to dissolve these combinations.

But, Mr. President, it is not necessary for the Standard Oil Co. to enter into any combination with anybody else or any conspiracy or any contract in order to control the trade in which it is engaged. It is powerful enough to control trade without the help of anyone else or the formation of subsidiary corporations. If we are going to reach the Standard Oil Co. we must define the specific offenses that will bring that corporation within the inhibition of the law and enforce those specific provisions not only against the corporation but against its officers and directors.

That is the weakness of the legislation that is now before the Senate. With very few exceptions, there is no specific provision here that if violated would bring any of these corporations or their officers under the ban of the law. There is a specific provision against discriminations not very well defined. Of course that is a specific provision that might be violated and the officers engaged in it punished, but there are thousands of things that may be done in restraint of trade by the great corporations without any combination or conspiracy. That is not covered by these bills or any laws that we have ever passed.

What I should like to see would be the passage of some law in aid of the trust laws that we already have which would make these offenders criminally liable and subject them to fine and imprisonment for violations of the law that we might enact, defining specific offenses independently of any combination or conspiracy.

Let us go to the fullest extent provided for in the Sherman antitrust law and we have simply dissolved the combinations. We have punished for the specific acts of conspiracy; we have been able to punish to a certain extent for the combination or acts of that kind that have been committed by offending corporations; but the acts that have been done by them in furtherance of the conspiracy, the actual interference with free competition or in restraint of trade, have not been touched; and by the legislation that we are proposing here to-day they are not going to be touched or made criminal.

I only wanted, Mr. President, to call attention in this brief way to what I think is the weakness of this proposed legislation. I do not believe it is going to aid or strengthen the trust legislation in the slightest degree.

There are certain provisions in the so-called Clayton bill that will be beneficial, and I should be glad to see them made a part of the laws because they come within my ideas of what should be done in order to effect some legislation that will prevent offenses in restraint of trade.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. JONES. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that he has reached, through the decisions of the courts, definite conclusions with reference to certain acts that ought to be prohibited, and that he thinks the legislation that is to be passed ought to punish those particular acts?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; and define other offenses.

Mr. JONES. And that such legislation should define them and punish them; that in that way we should secure effective legislation; and that the pending legislation is uncertain and indefinite, and will not accomplish the results intended? Now, it might be interesting, in connection with that, to read from a high authority merely a few lines, which I should like to read if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I read as follows:

> Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

That is the language used by the President of the United States in his message of January 20, 1914.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the declarations made by the President of the United States, not only as they have just been read, but with other statements made by the President before his election, bearing out exactly what I am contending for. What I should like to see done is to punish guilty business and guilty business men and not to burden by commissions and otherwise innocent business and innocent business men. That is precisely what we are doing in this case. The innocent business man is going to suffer from this legislation almost as much as is the guilty business man.

What I should like to do is to seek out the man who has violated not only the law but the rights of individuals in a business way and to punish the offenders, and not to burden innocent business with commissions and other things of that kind for which ultimately the people will have to pay.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it; the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, may I ask unanimous consent to file a memorial signed by some 250 business men of the State of Ohio opposing the enactment of the so-called antitrust bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I regret very much to do so, but I must object. We are acting under a certain order, and we are to have no morning hour, very much to my disappointment, and I intend to object to any business of any kind that is not in order until we can have a morning hour for the disposition of such matters as ought to be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio. The question is——

Mr. BURTON. I will state, Mr. President, if I may be allowed a moment, that this memorial pertains immediately to the question now under discussion. I trust no order of business prescribed by the Senate will prevent the filing of communications which are immediately pertinent to the question under discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the memorial is in order, of course my point would be overruled; but if its presentation requires unanimous consent, I object. I must do so now because I intend to do so in every similar instance when I am in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say——

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that if he is not in the Chamber and I am, I shall object to any sort of business being done other than that which is the regular order of the Senate so long as we take a recess from day to day.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, as the Senate will, of course, remember, was submitted on Wednesday morning last. It was printed in the RECORD, and has also been printed by order of the House of Representatives and by the Senate in the usual form. Of course, Senators have availed themselves of the opportunity to familiarize themselves with the report.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, in relation to the action taken by the committee of conference I will say that there are several items in the bill which I think the representatives of the Senate should have retained and as to which the House should have receded. I am not saying this in a spirit of criticism, yet it seems to me those items should have been retained in the bill. They were for the benefit not only of the Indians but of the department. For instance, on page 11 of the bill there is an amendment providing that in hiring farmers——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the presentation of a conference report is a privileged matter. I ask whether the consideration of the report is also privileged and whether the Senate can, unless there is affirmative action, proceed to the consideration of such a report?

Mr. ASHURST. My motion was that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report. The question was put; there were numerous ayes and some noes, and the Vice President, rightly, I think, declared that the motion was carried. That removes the matter from any doubt as to the report being privileged; but I wish to say that, in any event, such a report is privileged in its own right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not sure about it myself. In order to raise the question, so that the Chair may decide it——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair put the question on the motion of the Senator from Arizona, and the Senate voted upon it. The Chair held that the motion was agreed to, and laid the conference report before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will state it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Are not conference reports always in order, and do they not have preference over all other matters?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair read the rule on yesterday, and will again read it for the information of Senators:

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order—

That is, the presentation of the report—except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing—

That relates to the presentation of the report. In this case the report has already been presented—and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

So the motion to proceed to the consideration of the report may be made at any time. There is no doubt about that. Such a report does not come up automatically, but in this case it came up on motion.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, it seems to me that where legislation is sought which has to do with human life and with property of much value for which we are responsible as trustees, it is not inappropriate to call attention to certain items in the bill which I think should be retained in order that we may do our full duty under the circumstances.

I now desire to refer to an item on page 11, being amendment No. 21. The department asked, I think wisely, for legislation which would authorize them in selecting farmers to instruct the Indians and educate them in farming, so that they may hereafter become self-supporting, to select them from experienced and qualified men recommended by the agricultural schools in the States in which the Indians to be instructed reside. I think it will be conceded that a man who has been educated in farming methods in his own State, say, in Mississippi, would be better adapted to instruct in farming in that country than he would be in Minnesota or North Dakota or in eastern Oregon, where dry-farming methods are used, and he would be more apt to be of use and of benefit to the Indians of that locality. I thought that that provision incorporated in the bill by the Senate ought to stay in, but I am sorry to say that other conferees on the part of the Senate, who are more experienced than I am in these matters and more familiar with the management of Indian affairs, receded upon that amendment. I think, as I have said, that it is a wise provision and should be kept in, and I could not agree that the Senate should recede from it.

A provision was inserted in the bill in the Senate providing that—

Upon the determination of the heirs of a deceased Indian by the Secretary of the Interior, there shall be paid by such heirs, or from the estate of such deceased Indian, or deducted from the proceeds from the sale of the land of the deceased allottee, or from any trust funds belonging to the estate of the decedent, the sum of $10.

That has been increased to $15. That does not amount to very much, it may be said. Fifteen dollars may not strike Senators as being a very large sum of money, yet it is more money than many Indians ever have at one time in their entire lives, and it means the difference to many of them at times between something to eat and starvation. I thought that the costs of prosecuting the suit should be made as reasonable and fixed as low to the Indian as possible, and rather than have it $15 it had better be fixed at $5.

I also desire to call attention to amendment No. 33, wherein $6,000 of Indian money is appropriated to build a bridge across a river in Arizona. This appropriation was made reimbursable from the funds of the Indians. I dislike to say anything about Arizona, inasmuch as the chairman of the committee comes from that State, but there has been no definite statement and no analysis placed before the committee which either proves or disproves that the proposed bridge is not being built largely for the benefit of the whites, and I thought that the whites should be made to pay their share of it pro rata to the extent to which they receive benefit, and that we should not make the appropriation entirely out of the funds of the Indians. I objected to that and shall continue to object to it until I know the facts concerning it. I do not know them at this time.

There was another item incorporated in the bill by the Senate after much discussion in the Committee on Indian Affairs, which considered the bill in the first place, wherein no appropriation of the tribal funds of the Indians in Minnesota—and it was made to apply pretty generally along down the line; I do not pick this out for the reason that it relates to Minnesota—shall be available until such expenditure has been duly approved by the tribe of Indians whose funds are to be expended, thus giving them a voice and a right to say what is to be done with their money. In the past they have had no voice, but, at the whim or the will of the department, they are placed either in what is called "the restricted class" or outside of that class so far as the right to file upon land and farm the same is concerned, and are kept under halfway supervisory control, making them dependent for the use of their land and in other ways, for instance, as to any profit they make off of it, upon the whim of some superior officer. I thought it would be no more than wise and no more than fair to give them a voice in the matter. It would put a stop to a great deal of mismanagement of their affairs, for many Indians are intelligent, some of them more intelligent than the Government officers in charge of them.

Of course it would lead to a good deal of discussion; it might lead to logrolling and the use of political methods, and it might eventually work harmfully to the Indian; but at the same time, if we are trying to civilize the Indian and teach him how to do business after the manner of the white man, there would be no better lesson and no better training for Indians than to be allowed to meet in council, to use their judgment, and to pass their opinion on questions as to how their money should be expended. I think that is no more than fair, and in my opinion we do a very unfair thing when we deny to them, as our wards, the right to say what we shall do with their money.

If they had not suffered at our hands in the past such a lamentable and unfortunate experience in connection with their affairs while we have been acting as their guardians it would be a different matter. But they have had an unfortunate experience; they have lost much money and hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars of their property has been literally wasted and thrown away, and they have never had a right even to place a veto upon the manner in which it was being expended. That provision is also repeated on page 97, in amendment numbered 166.

It seems to me that these matters are of importance, and I should like to have the Senate instruct their conferees to take the bill back to conference and secure the retention in the bill of as many of the amendments to which I have referred as they can.

This Indian appropriation bill has to do with affairs of great importance to a large number of people, and I must say that in many respects those affairs are not being handled in a manner which any Senator would tolerate in the handling of his money or property without a most vigorous protest. As I said the other day, I do not think it has always been done with criminal intent, and yet there has grown up a bureaucratic and slack method of handling these affairs, with an entire lack of responsibility. There is no responsibility fixed anywhere. Congress does not know much about it. Even those who have been on the committee for years have not been furnished full information, but they have had to place their faith in others. The Indian has not advanced in civilization; he has not become a business man; his health has not improved; in fact, he is deteriorating. Some tribes have almost entirely died out in consequence of the inequality with which they have been treated. I think these things should be largely matters of conscience with us. A full presentation of them should be had here, and we should authorize members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate to go back into conference and to stand for anything and everything which will help without prejudice to relieve the Indians from the unfortunate condition in which they have been placed after a hundred years of the kind of treatment which has been accorded them.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in reply to the remarks of my good friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], I must say that he gave the committee faithful, assiduous, and, I think, valuable service in this conference. He was especially valuable to the committee, and he was the last—if I am permitted to reveal what took place in the committee—to recede from any amendments made by the Senate. He was a faithful servant of the Senate in every respect and went so far as to decline to join in the conference report, which he had a right to do, and I honor him for his individuality of opinion.

After a full and free conference, however, lasting nearly 10 days, the Senate conferees were obliged to and did recede on a number of amendments. On a large number of amendments the Senate conferees declined to recede. On several important amendments, especially two upon which the Senate had instructed us by a roll-call vote, the Senate conferees declined to recede and have reported their disagreement to this body. The conferees are now before you asking that you agree to the report submitted by the conferees and that you further instruct us as to the amendments in disagreement.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. CATRON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico. Then I will yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I notice by the report of the committee that amendment numbered 101, referring to an appropriation for the Mescalero Apache Indians, has been agreed to be stricken out. That amendment in part reads as follows:

There is hereby appropriated the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to use this money, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the promotion of civilization and self-support among the Indians residing and having tribal rights on the Mescalero Indian Reservation in New Mexico, the said sum to be expended in the purchase of live stock, seed, vehicles, harness, machinery, tools, implements, and other agricultural equipment, and for such other purposes as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper in promoting their civilization and self-support.

I wish to call attention to the fact that about two years ago, shortly after New Mexico was admitted as a State, a provision was incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill to remove the Apache Indians who were then in the State of Oklahoma to the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico. That provision, when it came into the Senate, was objected to by my colleague [Mr. FALL] and myself, and it was unanimously stricken out. By that it was determined, and I thought every Member of the Senate so understood, that those Indians should not be moved back into New Mexico or to the Mescalero Indian Reservation.

There was a provision in that bill, however, almost similar to the one which I have just read, providing for acts on the part of the Government contributing toward their civilization and self-support. The department, after Congress adjourned, availed itself of that provision to use those funds, as I understand, to take those Indians back to New Mexico, regardless of the action of the Senate and of Congress in refusing to make a direct appropriation for that purpose when it had been called to their attention, and when it was supposed that that expression on behalf of the Senate was sufficient to say that we did not accede to the idea that they should be taken back.

Those Indians were induced by emissaries who were sent there by some members of the department of the Government under whose control they were to accede to being taken back to the Mescalero Indian Reservation, on the assurance that when taken there appropriations like this which has been stricken out would be made for them annually, so as to enable them to advance in knowledge of agriculture, knowledge of civilization, and other things contributing to their support, in order to make them finally citizens, so that they could take lands in severalty by allotment and become citizens of the United States. That, if they are to be there, is the desirable object to be accomplished. It is the one which the people of New Mexico wish. To-day the Mescalero Indian Reservation contains enough land to give every man, woman, and child of those Indians several hundred acres of land each, much more than any settler on the public domain can get under any law that now exists. The settler would be limited to a homestead for his family, while these Indians get it for every man, woman, and child.

What I wish to know from the Senator is, what provision is to be made, if any has been made, to take care of these Indians and do for them what it was understood when they agreed to go back there would be done for them? What provision is made to furnish them these implements, animals, and so forth, and contribute to their civilization and enable them to contribute to their self-support?

We do not want it understood that there is something concealed in this bill, which is not expressed in it clearly and not apparent in the record, like it was in the bill under which they were transferred back there—that is, something which can be ignored and applied to some other purpose for which it was not intended—and have them say it was left open and was not sufficiently definite. We want the record to show it plainly if there is anything for the Indians of that reservation. As this bill is to go back to conference, we ask that it go back there with this provision to be considered over again.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in reply to the question propounded by the Senator from New Mexico, if he has a copy of the Indian appropriation bill before him, and will turn to it, I ask his attention to page 15, beginning with line 21, which reads as follows:

For the purpose of encouraging industry and self-support among the Indians and to aid them in the culture of fruits, grains, and other crops, $400,000—

That is stricken out, and "$100,000" inserted—or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, which sum may be used for the purchase of seed, animals, machinery, tools, implements, and other equipment necessary to enable Indians to become self-supporting—

And so forth.

The Senate conferees, after a long discussion, reached an agreement with the House conferees making that sum read "$600,000." That will be available for these purposes; and I further call the attention of the Senator to line 10, on page 16, wherein it is stated:

That not to exceed $50,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended on any one reservation or for the benefit of any one tribe of Indians.

The House receded from that amendment, with an amendment restoring the same, so that it shall read:

That not to exceed $75,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended on any one reservation or for the benefit of any one tribe of Indians.

I do not know that I am doing the correct thing in stating what took place before the conference committee; but unless objection is made, I will say that I specifically referred to the situation on the Mescalero Reservation. I called attention to the fact that Gen. Scott, a very distinguished Army officer, who has had a great career, and who has done much good service in the State from which the Senator comes and which he so ably represents, had written a letter urging this appropriation of $200,000. The conference committee—and I say this for the RECORD—was assured by the Indian Office—and I take their word—that $75,000 of this sum of $600,000 would be spent in taking care of the Indians on the Mescalero Indian Reservation in New Mexico, as contemplated by amendment No. 101, found on page 47 of the bill.

For myself, I felt that the sum of $75,000 for each particular tribe was too small, but it was all that could be obtained, and I am going to state a fact that seems unnecessary. Congress is a bicameral affair. There are two Houses, as we all know. Senators who are friends of mine have complained to me because the conferees receded here and there. I say that we have receded only where it was apparent that it was necessary to recede or probably defeat the Indian bill. The House conferees were generous, and yielded on many points.

I trust this explanation will be satisfactory to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I hope when this matter goes back to conference the Senator will call up this item again. I do not think $75,000 is enough for that purpose. The bill which was passed some two years ago to do these very same things for those Indians while they were in Oklahoma—and it was understood that it should be expended for them in Oklahoma—contained at least double that amount for simply the portion of them that were in Oklahoma, not including those that were on the reservation at that time, which constituted the greatest number of them. When those Indians gave their assent to go back there they understood that something like the amount which was appropriated in that bill, from $150,000 to $200,000, would be annually appropriated for them until they acquired habits of civilization and were able to become self-supporting. It is unfair, it is not in good faith with those Indians, if this is intended to give them anything, to cut down the amount now to at least one-half what was provided for them. Besides, this provision does not say that anything shall be given to those Indians. It only says that not to exceed $75,000 shall be given to "any one Indian reservation," leaving it to the department to leave out any reservation they desire and give it to others, wherever they may be able to distribute it, if they can find that many. I have no doubt but that they will find that many without any trouble.

We ask the conferees, when the matter goes back to conference, to take up this matter again, and at least make that $100,000, and apply it directly to the Mescalero Indians, so that the department can not act as it has acted heretofore, and appropriate the moneys differently from the way they have been intended to be appropriated.

I wish this statement to go into the RECORD, so that the department will know what is being done here and what is the sentiment of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the conferees have been unable to agree with reference to certain amendments, including amendments numbered 81 and 82. These two amendments refer to an appropriation for the continuation of the work on the irrigation project within the Flathead Indian Reservation in the State of Montana.

The bill as it came from the House carried an appropriation of $100,000 for this work. The Senate committee recommended amendment 81, providing for the increase of this appropriation to $250,000. That was concurred in by the Senate; but there was added to it amendment 82, which reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Attorney General of the United States shall, after submission to him by the Secretary of the Interior of a request for an opinion thereon, hold affirmatively that, in his opinion, the Indians under existing law are protected and confirmed in their water rights.

I do not believe it will be necessary to dwell at length upon the reasons which ought to impel the Senate to adhere to its amendment numbered 81, providing for the increase of the appropriation for this work on the Flathead Indian Reservation. I feel justified, however, in making a brief review of the facts which make the increase imperative. The Flathead Indian Reservation was opened pursuant to an act passed 10 years ago, in the year 1904. About that time, or shortly thereafter, a project was planned for the reclamation of the lands within the reservation. A scheme of reclamation was proposed and outlined by the Indian Department, in conjunction with the Reclamation Service, and the Indians selected their allotments within the reservation in view of the construction of that project. The remainder of the lands, in addition to those selected by the Indians, were opened to settlement, the money paid by the settlers for the lands to go to the benefit of the Indians. It was represented to the settlers that this reclamation project would be carried on, and as indicative of the purpose of Congress appropriations were made from time to time for carrying on this work of from $250,000 to $400,000.

Mr. President, anyone conversant with the extent of these projects and of the expense incident to their economic conduct will recognize at once that a project as vast as this, which contemplates the ultimate expenditure of something in the neighborhood of $5,000,000, is carried on without any economy whatever unless a substantial amount is expended each year. A little appropriation of $50,000 or $100,000, contemplating, as you will perceive, the completion of the work in possibly 30 or 40 or 50 years, might as well not be expended at all. Unless an appropriation of a quarter million dollars a year is made, the project might just as well be abandoned, and the Government repudiate the implied obligation under which it rests to the Indians upon the Flathead Reservation, as well as to the settlers who have gone there at the invitation of the Government.

I believe, Mr. President, that we shall have no difficulty in convincing the House conferees that this appropriation ought to be at least $250,000. In that behalf, I may say that the Montana delegation, when the bill came over here, waited upon the Secretary of the Interior, who called in the head of the Reclamation Service and the head of the Indian Bureau, both of whom agreed with him that the appropriation ought to be that amount. Their views about the matter had appropriate force with the committee, and the recommendation was made as I stated.

But, Mr. President, when the amendment came before the Senate for consideration about a month since, during my absence from the city, amendment No. 82 was added in language as I have quoted. I can not but believe that the amendment was added to the bill without any real adequate comprehension of the significance of it, if it has any significance whatever. Indeed, Mr. President, I have studiously endeavored to find out what was the idea in the minds of those proposing this amendment and what they intended to accomplish by it. It provides that this appropriation shall not be available until an affirmative opinion is obtained from the Attorney General of the United States upon the question as to whether the rights of the Indians with reference to water are properly protected and confirmed by the existing laws.

Now, what does that mean, Mr. President? Whatever rights the Indians have in the waters of any stream are of course protected by existing laws. You do not need any laws to protect them in whatever rights they have in waters, because the Constitution of the United States protects them in those rights.

The real question, I apprehend, which was in the minds of the framers of this amendment was to ascertain what rights the Indians have. Now, Mr. President, with reference to that matter it was advanced in some way or other, I do not know just exactly how, that Indians were denied the right to make appropriations of water in the State of Montana; that some Indians had gone to the proper office at which to file their appropriations of water and had been denied the opportunity to do so. There is no evidence from any quarter that has come to my notice, and I have inquired carefully, that anything of the kind has ever occurred. But it was in a way rumored about that such a condition existed in the State of Montana.

Mr. President, I desire to say for the information of the Senate that under the laws of the State of Montana an Indian has just exactly the same right to make an appropriation of water that a white man has. There is no restriction in our law which would in any manner prohibit an Indian from making an appropriation of water if he saw fit to do so, and the rule is well established that unless there is some prohibition in the local law anyone may make an appropriation of water. Indeed the adjudications in our State lay down so liberal a rule that it has been declared by our supreme court that even a Chinaman may make an appropriation of water in the State of Montana, or at least that he may hold water right and he may transfer it, and no one except the Government can be heard to question his right thereto.

So, Mr. President, the law of our State being entirely clear, and there being no doubt whatever about it, I entertain the very gravest doubt as to whether any Indian was ever denied the right anywhere in my State to make an appropriation of water if he had any desire to exercise it. That is a matter, however, of very little consequence here, because every Indian on the Flathead Reservation had an opportunity to take his allotment out of lands under the irrigation project; and, bear in mind, when the Indian takes his land under the irrigation project and selects an allotment of that character he does not have to make any appropriation of water at all. The law of the State of Montana permits the Government of the United States to make an appropriation of water for any reclamation project which it sees fit to carry on, and it is so liberal in that regard that although in the case of a private individual he must begin his work upon his ditch within 40 days after he files his notice, the Government of the United States has two whole years after it makes the appropriation before it is under any requirement whatever to begin the work contemplated.

So far as the Flathead Indian Reservation is concerned, the Government has made the appropriation of water necessary to supply this great project under consideration in the construction of which it is now engaged, and every Indian on the Flathead Reservation who has taken an allotment under the project is perfectly protected in his rights by that appropriation, so made by the Government in his behalf.

Mr. President, if an Indian wanted a piece of irrigated land when he selected his allotment he would, in all probability, select land under the irrigation project, but if there are any Indians who desire to have irrigated lands and desire to cultivate land of that character who have selected their allotments elsewhere they have a perfect right, under our law, if they desire to do so, to appropriate water for the irrigation of such land.

The fact about the matter is, Mr. President, that there are none such, nor, sir, is there any water now available for that purpose. It will be understood that this law was passed 10 years ago. It was decided in the case of The United States against Winters and others, in connection with the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation, that the Indians for whom a reservation had been set aside had the right to the use of the water within that reservation, as well as the lands, and that no one could divert the water of a stream flowing down through a reservation so as to deprive the Indians of the use of that water, although they had made no appropriation. So when settlers went above the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation and diverted the water of the Milk River and left it a dry stream opposite the reservation the Government interposed, by injunction, and compelled them to allow the water to flow down.

But no such condition as that obtains upon the Flathead Indian Reservation, because all the streams except the Clarks Fork of the Columbia River, which forms the southern boundary of the reservation—all the streams upon the reservation arise within it and do not come to it from the outside. The great stream mentioned is a navigable river and carries more water than it would be possible to take from it for any purpose of irrigation. Indeed, it flows through a region so situated as to make it unavailable for the irrigation of the Flathead Indian Reservation at all.

So, Mr. President, there is nothing here that in anywise lends any countenance to the idea of arresting the expenditure of these moneys until an answer is received from the Attorney General of the United States to the effect that the rights of the Indians are properly protected.

But, Mr. President, allow me to remark in this connection that there is no difference in that respect between the Flathead Indian Reservation and any other reservation in connection with which the Government of the United States is carrying on any work of reclamation. It is carrying on similar work on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, and no suggestion is made that the appropriation for that purpose ought to be held up until an opinion of this character is obtained. Work of like character is being carried on upon the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, and there the rights of the Indians are just exactly the same. So likewise work is being carried on upon the Crow Indian Reservation, and, indeed, work is being carried on by the Government on reservations in nearly all the Western States within which there are reservations, and the rights of the Indians upon all those reservations are practically identical. The acts by which the reservations were created are all of the same general character, and the rights of the Indians in connection with one are exactly the same as the rights with reference to the others.

Now, why should the appropriation for the work upon the Flathead Indian Reservation be held up until an opinion is obtained from the Attorney General of the United States and the work go on upon all the other reclamation projects that exist under just exactly the same conditions?

I must confess, Mr. President, that I am not a little at sea as to what the ideas may have been which prompted the adoption of this amendment, but I am sure that it serves no useful purpose here and could have no effect whatever except to arrest this work, with the consequent loss to the Government which must ensue if the money is not available to carry it on. Everybody will understand that in order to carry on these projects with economy it becomes necessary to assemble a force, it becomes necessary to gather together horses and mules for the purpose of excavation, and power generally. These must be taken care of. It becomes necessary to assemble machinery for the purpose of conducting the work, which deteriorates by nonuse. There is an enormous loss and a useless expenditure unless the work is carried on with some degree of continuity. If the expenditure is arrested by this kind of a provision, a very substantial loss will ensue to the Government.

I trust very sincerely that we will agree to instruct the conferees to recede from this amendment, and accordingly I move that the Senate conferees be instructed to insist upon amendment numbered 81 and to recede from amendment numbered 82.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise for information. I ask the Chair or any Senator who will be so kind as to tell me what is the correct procedure. I am oblivious as to whether the conference report as agreed upon should be adopted and then the question as to the instruction of the conferees on the disagreeing portion should be considered. I do not know just how the Senate has been in the habit of proceeding in such cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire as to whether the motion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is with reference to the amendments that have already been agreed upon in the conference?

Mr. ASHURST. They have been disagreed to in the conference.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to make it plain that they were not receded from. There is a deadlock as to those two amendments between the House and the Senate conferees. There is a failure to agree on anything in regard to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then, of course, the first question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President I desire to make a motion in connection with the matter on which I addressed the Senate a short time ago. The motion which I propose, if it is in order now, is that the Senate shall refuse to agree to amendments 101 and 29, and that the committee be instructed to insist that not less than $100,000 of the $600,000 agreed to be appropriated shall be expended at the Mescalero Apache Indian Reservation. I understand the Commissioner of Indian Affairs insists upon it in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire of the Senator from New Mexico as to whether the item concerning which he makes his motion has been agreed to by the conferees?

Mr. CATRON. I understand it has.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to rule that the conference report must be accepted or rejected as a whole. The reason for the ruling on that parliamentary situation of affairs must be perfectly apparent. A large number of items are in disagreement between the House and Senate. It is to be presumed that the House conferees yielded upon certain points because the Senate conferees yielded upon other points, and there is no method of knowing that the conference report would be satisfactory to the House with this particular item omitted from the conference report.

Mr. CATRON. Then I request the Senate to refuse to concur in the report, so that I can make a motion to send it back with that instruction.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I heartily concur in the motion made by my colleague [Mr. WALSH], that the Senate insist on amendment 81 and instruct its conferees to recede from amendment 82, and when the time comes for a vote thereon I sincerely hope the motion will prevail.

I do not believe that anyone who paid attention to the remarkably clear, concise, comprehensive, and lucid explanation of my colleague can fail to perceive the injustice of the amendment of which we complain, and which is amendment 82 of the bill. I do not believe that anyone who listened to his statement of the matter can fail to realize the justice of our position and the injustice of this amendment.

As a matter of fact, the rights of the Indians on the Flathead Indian Reservation are just the same as the rights of the Indians on any other Indian reservation where there is a reclamation project under construction. Their rights are just the same, no more and no less, and their rights under the Flathead reclamation project are even better protected than the rights of the white settlers, because, as my colleague has stated, they had first choice of the land. They had the first right to choose land that came under that reclamation project, and the water for those lands is appropriated by the United States Government and is thereby secure to Indians, who get the first allotment and make the first selection. I fail to see, as my colleague fails to see, any reason whatsoever for any discrimination against that project. As a matter of fact there is an appropriation in the bill for the prosecution of work under the same circumstances on a reclamation project in an Indian reservation in the State of Arizona, and there is no such crippling or handicapping amendment put on that appropriation. There is another appropriation for such work in the State of California, and there is no amendment on that appropriation. There is another appropriation for such work in the State of Idaho, on the Fort Hall Reservation, and there is no such amendment put on that appropriation. There is an amendment for the prosecution and completion of similar work in the State of Utah, but there is no such amendment put on that appropriation.

In the name of all fairness and sense and justice, why should our project be singled out to be stigmatized and crucified and have a provision made with respect to it which is not made with respect to other appropriations for other projects under the same conditions and of exactly the same nature?

I am authorized to say, and I now say by authority, that the Indian Bureau is utterly opposed to this amendment to the Flathead appropriation, and deems it unwise, unjust, unreasonable, improper, and discriminatory. I was authorized this morning—this very day—by Mr. Meritt, the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to say for him and for Mr. Sells, the commissioner, that both of them think this amendment is unfair and improper and that it should be receded from; that it serves no good purpose; that they are not in favor of it; and not only are they not in favor of it, but they are both opposed to it and want to see it receded from. I have ample authority also for saying that the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, feels the same way about it. He thinks it is unjust and improper. I know the Reclamation Service, and Mr. F. H. Newell, Director of the Reclamation Service, feel the same way about it. There is no bureau or department of the Government which is upholding this amendment or justifying it or which thinks it is fair. I have the word of all of them that they are opposed to it and think it unfair, and that it ought to be rescinded.

As to the nature of this obnoxious amendment, I will say that it is very vague. I doubt, exceedingly, if the Attorney General could comply with its exact words. He could only state what the rights of the Indians are, after an exhaustive investigation, which might take weeks or months; he could only state the facts as they are. Then, whether or not the Indians are fully protected is a matter of opinion. One man might think one way about it and another man might think another way about it. What the Attorney General might say in the matter can be but mere speculation, or he might decline to express any opinion upon any such vague subject.

The rights of the Indians on the Flathead project are just the same as the rights of the Indians on any other project. They are really superior to the rights of the whites. Even if the Attorney General should see his way clear to render an opinion in the exact words of this vague and meaningless amendment, he is busy with other things, and it might take him weeks or months to get to it. In the meantime the work on this project, which is being prosecuted with the old appropriation of last year, would have to be suspended and hung up until the Attorney General had rendered his opinion. I undertake to say that if that work is suspended it will be done at a loss and waste of $50,000. The contracts would have to be rescinded, the contractors discharged, the force of men and teams scattered. To get them together would require months, and the work would have to be resumed where it was left off. There would be a loss, I believe, of at least $50,000. It would be unjust to take this action.

Therefore I am in hearty accord with my colleague [Mr. WALSH]. I think this obnoxious amendment ought to be receded from, and I hope the motion will prevail. The amendment is unjust, unfair, unreasonable, unwarranted, discriminatory. There is no reason for it. It can not be justified. It discriminates, penalizes, without cause.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the other side of the case, the one which was considered by those who brought about the insertion of this amendment, was the condition of affairs as it actually existed, not only on the Flathead Reservation but on other reservations in Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator to permit me to ask a question at this juncture. Right now seems to be an opportune time. Why should anyone select this particular project to put on such an amendment and not select others of the same character?

Mr. LANE. I do not know why it was fixed upon. I presume it was the first one of the Montana items which came up in the bill.

Mr. MYERS. No, Mr. President. The Blackfeet item was the first one which came up, and such an amendment was not placed on that project.

Mr. LANE. Then I will endeavor to make it plain.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator why he picks out Montana—why he singles out the Montana reclamation project?

Mr. LANE. Who does?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator does. He speaks about there being something peculiar about the Montana reclamation projects. In what respect do they differ from the reclamation projects in his State?

Mr. LANE. If the Senator will allow me time, and will be patient, I will try to answer him as well as I can. I can not do so until I get an opportunity.

In regard to this amendment which was put into the bill, the reasons for it, as I understand them, were as follows: There had been a reclamation project started on a number of reservations throughout the country, including some in Montana. Those projects were initiated on an appropriation which was reimbursable out of the funds of the Indians after the sale of their lands. I presume at the time the projects were inaugurated everybody thought it was a good thing for the Indian; that it was to be one of the means by which he was to be civilized through affording him opportunity to irrigate land and raise crops upon land which was not being used for any purpose at the time. In addition to that, it allowed the land to be sold to the white settlers who desired to settle in the country.

As a matter of fact, what really happened was this: The Indian lands were mortgaged for the construction of these reclamation projects. The project upon the Flathead Reservation, in all, will cost some six or seven million dollars. The Indian was given, under a law which was passed in 1907, one year's time within which to acquire his water rights by making use of the water. At the same time, the Indian was the ward of the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, to what law does the Senator from Oregon refer?

Mr. LANE. To the law passed in 1907. There is an act which circumscribes the Indian as to time, and his limit, I think, does not exceed one or two years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I may interrupt the Senator further, the statement that there is such a law as that is somewhat startling to me, and I wish the Senator would refer us to the law.

Mr. LANE. I will hunt it up for the Senator as soon as I get through my statement. It was startling to me also.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator mean that there is an act of Congress which provides that the Indian must make his appropriation of water within a year?

Mr. LANE. I think there is in terms something to that effect. That is my understanding.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should be very much interested in seeing that law.

Mr. LANE. I would be interested, too.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LANE. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I can enlighten the Senator from Utah upon the matter, and I shall be very glad to tell him just exactly what the Senator from Oregon refers to. The act opening the Blackfeet Indian Reservation was passed in the year 1907. It was made open to settlement after the proclamation of the President. That proclamation has not yet been issued, and it is probable that the act will be repealed. That act provided that the Indians should have a priority in the appropriation of water for one year after the proclamation opening the reservation. That is what the Senator from Oregon is talking about.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. An act of Congress?

Mr. WALSH. An act of Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Which gives the Indian a preferential right to appropriate water in a State?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. LANE. But he had——

Mr. WALSH. Let me add, so that Senators may understand the situation, that the Flathead Reservation was opened by proclamation four years ago; the lands have already been taken up; the Indians have taken their allotments, and it is not possible under the circumstances to make the provision under discussion applicable to the Flathead Reservation.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, there was a law passed in 1907 by Congress by which the Indians were circumscribed in some of the reservations as to the time in which they could secure their water rights. That struck the committee as being unfair. The Indian is a ward; he has no money with which to buy implements, such as plows, harrows, or to buy horses, cows, or with which to build a house to enable him to make a home upon this lowland and become a farmer; and in some instances he would lose his right if he did not do these things within a certain period of time. That seemed to the committee unfair.

Again, quite a number of the Indians did not choose the low, flat valley land along the creek and the river bottoms. Those lands are the most valuable, and are the lands which can be irrigated; but the Indians went out and took lands in the mountains which never could be irrigated under an irrigation scheme.

To a person who does not know the Indian that would seem peculiar; yet that is what all Indians would naturally do, for anyone who has ever lived out in the mountains and is familiar with them knows that the flat lands or the lowlands are the poorest places in the country in which to make a camp. They are damp and cold, and there is a fog and mist that rises. The Indians do not camp in such places as a rule; they camp up on the bench lands. Again, in the summer the flat lands down in the brush, where the land is rich, are mosquito-ridden, and you can not stay there. So the Indians get back on the benches, the same as other human beings would do. When it comes to irrigating the land and raising alfalfa, vegetables, and other crops, that is the better land; but in a state of nature, as wild land, that is land to keep away from; and the Indian did keep away from it. A good many of them, though not all of them, went back to the hills where they had always lived and refused to take this lowland. So the Indian then was in a position where his lands, which never could be irrigated, were mortgaged to pay for the irrigation of the other land to which he had no title.

At the same time, as I have said, he was not allowed funds with which to make improvements and to purchase implements. I understand arrangements are now being made to remedy that evil, which has existed for years, and we hope that the conditions will be bettered after a time, but in many cases this is the situation.

In regard to the Crows, the way in which their lands have been handled amounts to a scandal. The revenue of the Indians is being used at this time, or has been used, unless it has been stopped lately, to keep in repair the reclamation scheme which irrigates the lands of the white man and from which very few Indians receive any benefit at all. Large numbers of them are not allowed to use their allotted lands at all and are kept off of them. It is unjust.

It is proposed to expend some four or five million dollars to carry on a reclamation scheme, and the lands of the Indians are mortgaged for this money, and from present appearances the Indians will get very little benefit from it. If we continue to do business in this way acting as the guardians of the Indians, we will be subjected to suits for damages for not having done our duty and judgment will be lodged against this Government to pay the Indians for the injustice which has been done to them. A suit ought to lie in any court for damages on such a ground.

The committee concluded that it would be well to stop such practices and that it would be better to stop them now than to spend four or five million dollars more of the Indians' money or tie their lands up for such an amount. They thought it was better to stop it until the Indian was placed by his guardians on the land and given an opportunity to make use of it for his benefit, and then when that was done to throw the land open, as the Senator from Montana desires, to white settlers on fair terms, securing fair prices for it.

Some of the irrigable lands on these reservations are to be sold at an upset price, ranging from $3 to $10 an acre, and are worth, when water is put upon them, from $30 to $40 an acre. The Senator knows that, and he also knows that the Indians ought to have that difference. We as his guardians should see that he has an opportunity to make something out of his land and not put all the loss upon him. So the committee concluded that it was better to stop these expenditures unless they were properly safeguarded.

There is no reason why the Flathead Reservation should be singled out. The same principle should be applied, in my opinion, to all of the reservations where irrigation projects are being prosecuted, and I am willing to apply it to any and all of them so that the Indian, whose lands are being mortgaged for the expenditure, may be provided for justly. To that end we should stop spending any more of his money or obligating him and his lands until we do so.

Under proposed new irrigation legislation which has been introduced and passed in the Senate we have allowed the white man 20 years, I think, in which to make his payments on the lands located by him. It has been found that it took five or six years to subdue those new lands, and that under the terms of the old law the best farmer would frequently fail, and hundreds of them have failed; but the Indian, who never was a farmer, who is not naturally a farmer, and who knows nothing about farming and does not like it—and the least profitable of all work is probably farming—is put upon such land, and he has not been given a 5-cent piece with which to buy himself so much as a grubbing hoe to go out and raise a rutabaga with, if you please; and he is told that within a limited time he must use the water on the land or forfeit his water rights. There is something utterly unfair about it.

I am willing to say to the Senator that while his argument sounds very good, the conditions do exist, in many cases, as I have described them. So far as I am concerned, I want to remedy them and to apply the same principle to all the reservations to which they would or do apply.

If the Attorney General states that the wrong can be rectified without prejudice to the white settler, I will agree to the plan; but I will never consent that we, as their guardians, should expend the money of the Indians under the conditions in which their money has been spent in the past or to put upon them the burdens we have put upon them in the past. I wash my hands of participation in any such transaction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon before he takes his seat whether or not the white settlers upon this land will be required to pay for the water which they use upon their land?

Mr. LANE. I do not know the terms of the contract; I think in some cases they will be so required; but the land of the Indians is being mortgaged to carry on the project practically for the benefit of the whites; there is no disguising that fact, and it is not right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not a fact that the white settlers upon any of these lands will be obliged to pay a pro rata proportion of the expenditure involved in constructing this water system for any water which they use upon their land? That is true, is it not?

Mr. LANE. I think perhaps that is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not also true that the white settlers are first of all required to pay six, seven, or ten dollars an acre for the lands which they buy and to which thereafter they will apply water, and for which water they must also pay, whereas they would not be required to pay more than a dollar and a quarter an acre for the lands if they were not under an irrigation system?

Mr. LANE. Yes; but right there, I think, lies the wrong. If the Government, the guardian of the Indians, brought the water to the land and fixed the land up so that it could be used and then sold it at the highest market price, or at a fair market valuation, the Indian could get more than six or seven dollars; but under present conditions the Indian will get six or seven dollars for land which the white man, as soon as he gets it, can turn around and sell for thirty or forty and in some reservations for a hundred dollars an acre, and then the Indian is left without a dollar to improve his own land. There is something wrong with the proposition, and it should be rearranged. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the white man receives thirty or forty dollars an acre for his land, that will not only include the land, but the water rights, will it not?

Mr. LANE. Yes; but the land of each Indian has been mortgaged to bring the water there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the price of thirty or forty dollars will include the water right as well as the land?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the white settler will have paid practically thirty or forty dollars for his water right.

Mr. LANE. That is a very small price in proportion to what it is worth, and the Indian will be left to go up the flume, the same as he is now.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, no one can doubt the very high purpose that actuates the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] in his attitude concerning this particular amendment. No one can doubt his sincere desire to do the best he can as a representative of the Government in its capacity as guardian of the welfare of the Indians; but after his talk it is perfectly obvious that he does not desire any opinion on any question of law at all from the Attorney General. It is perfectly clear that he is satisfied that the whole administration of our Indian affairs for the past 10 years or the past quarter of a century has not been to any extent at all creditable. He contends—and to my mind very, very justly indeed—that the Indian Department ought to be equipped with the necessary funds to put an excellent farmer on the reservation, having supervision and charge over possibly a dozen Indian farmers, instructing them and encouraging them in their work, and that kind of thing; and he wants to get an opinion from the Attorney General, not on any disputed question of law, but an opinion as to the wisdom of the policy that has been pursued, and his opinion as to what amendments there ought to be in the law that would operate for the general betterment of the Indians and the improvement of their conditions.

That is really what he wants, if I am able to comprehend the Senator.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, he entirely fails to comprehend me when he says I am trying to get any such opinion as that. That was not my intention. I was trying to get the Attorney General's opinion, amongst others, as to any method by which we could protect the rights of the Indian.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; that is to say, what policy ought to be pursued the better to look after the Indians in the future. So, I believe, no reason has been advanced why this amendment ought to stay in the bill.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] have been very illuminating and very instructive, but I do not consider that they are pertinent to this amendment. While I am not particularly interested in this special amendment, it does seem only fair that the remarks made by the Senators from Montana should receive serious consideration at our hands. If there is any business in the world that requires careful attention, it is the construction of irrigation canals and the reclamation of arid lands. If there is any thing in the world that should be done promptly and with dispatch in order to secure beneficial results, it is the reclamation of arid lands. As the Senators from Montana have well said, if their wishes are not carried out, it is certainly going to delay the work on this reservation.

While I agree with what the Senator from Oregon has said relative to the treatment of the Indians, I do not think he has shown a single reason why this amendment should be adopted, and for that reason I believe the remarks of the Senators from Montana should be heeded in our consideration of this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am informed that the idea prevails that the matter of my motion is before the Senate. Will the Chair kindly state the matter that is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is a roll call for a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smoot
Brady	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Hughes	Page	Stone
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Sutherland
Camden	Kenyon	Pittman	Thomas
Catron	Kern	Poindexter	Thornton
Chilton	Lane	Pomerene	Tillman
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Vardaman
Colt	Lee, Md.	Reed	Walsh
Crawford	Lewis	Shafroth	Weeks
Culberson	Lippitt	Sheppard	West
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Shively	White
Gallinger	Myers	Simmons	Works
Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN]. He is paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], occasioned by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on agreeing to the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the motion made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to add some instructions, I will ask whether it is in order to amend the motion to accept the conference report by a motion to add certain instructions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided that the conference report must be either accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without instructions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without instructions.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will state it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It appears from the conference report that one or two propositions—and one of them is this one in connection with the Flathead Indian Reservation—are not covered by the conference report; and the Senator from Montana, before a motion was made to adopt the conference report, made a motion concerning those particular propositions. The question I wish to inquire about is whether the motion made by the Senator from Montana is not before the Senate for action before we pass upon the question of adopting the conference report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt at all about the parliamentary situation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That may be. There was in my mind, and I wanted to have it removed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certain items in disagreement between the two Houses have been agreed to by the conferees. Certain items, six of them, are still in dispute. As to the items that have been agreed to, there is not any question that the uniform rulings of the occupants of this chair have been that that is the first motion that comes up, and that it is the duty of the Senate either to concur in or to refuse to concur in the items which have been agreed upon, and that must be as a whole. If the Senate refuses to concur they go back, of course, for reconsideration, and then it is possible for instructions to be given to the conferees by the Senate. After the question of agreeing to the conference report has been determined by the Senate, then the motion of the Senator from Montana will be in order, to instruct the conferees with reference to the items that are yet in dispute between them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is in no way affected by this vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. None whatever.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the remarks of both Senators from Montana upon the matter in which they are especially interested, and also to the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico. It appears, therefore, that in the language of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] his colleague has made out a very strong case in the estimation of those who had the privilege of listening to his remarks, and that the only way for Senators interested in accomplishing the purposes which they have advocated here on the floor this morning under the parliamentary ruling of the Chair, which I have no doubt is perfectly correct, is to decline to accept the conference report.

The Senator from Arizona has moved that the conference report be agreed to, and that is the only motion we are allowed to vote on. So, unless Senators are prepared to let this thing go just as the managers on the part of the Senate have advised, their only remedy is to vote down the motion to agree to the conference report and then proceed to instruct the conferees to carry out such wishes as the Senate desires to express.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am really astonished, because the Senator from Connecticut is one of the best parliamentarians in the Senate. The question now is, Shall the report of the conferees, as far as they agreed, be agreed to by the Senate? If the conference report shall be agreed to, then the question comes up what instructions, if any, the Senate shall give the conferees on the items as to which the conferees have disagreed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On which there is a deadlock.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; on which there is a deadlock. Whatever action the Senate may take on the conference report will in no wise, in no manner whatever, interfere with the disposition of the subsequent items, six in number, upon which the conferees are deadlocked. So those who wish to vote with the Senators from Montana, those who are convinced that their position is correct, will find themselves guilty of no inconsistency whatever in voting to adopt the conference report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I hear what the Senator from Arizona says, and I appreciate what he intends as a compliment to me in a parliamentary line; but I am still of the same opinion that I was when I spoke before. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], who understands better than I do the matter in which he is interested, is firmly of the opinion that if the motion of the Senator from Arizona to agree to the conference report prevails it cuts him out absolutely.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course I cheerfully admit that if the motion should prevail to agree to the conference report, it would then prevent the conferees from considering the item to which the distinguished Senator from New Mexico has objected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whatever the items may be, of course the acceptance by the Senate of the conference report which has been agreed to by the conferees settles everything upon which the conferees have agreed.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course; and that is all I am saying.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Senators who do not want these matters settled as the managers on the part of the Senate have agreed to recommend that they should be settled must, to maintain their position, vote against agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon. I misheard him, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], I feel justified in disregarding the pair on this question, and I vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I wish to announce the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire whether the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, and on that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] who is absent. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask if the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not. He announced his pair with the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Being paired with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent from the city, and that he is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the remaining roll calls to-day.

Mr. HOLLIS (after having voted in the affirmative). Since I transferred my pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], he has come into the Chamber and voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent and is not able to be in attendance to-day. He is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I will let this statement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. CHILTON. Under the terms of my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], I think I can vote upon this question. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]; and that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 26, as follows:

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to inquire if my motion is now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to recede from amendment numbered 82 is in order.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Montana will yield to me for a moment, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are in this report six disagreements, although practically but four. One of those disagreements goes to the question of the amount to be appropriated to the Board of Indian Commissioners; another relates to the Montana item; and another relates to the Mississippi Choctaw item. Of course, I realize that we could not perhaps take a vote upon all these propositions, but before the disagreements go back to conference it would be desirable if we could get such an expression of opinion of the Senate as to be some guide in these matters that are still in disagreement. I simply call the attention of the Senate to the disagreements that the Senate may make such an expression as to Senators may seem desirable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 82?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am without sufficient information to vote intelligently upon the question. May I ask the Senator from Montana to state what is the proposed amendment?

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. I am in doubt as to what my vote should be. May I ask that the amendment be again read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment from which the Senator from Montana has moved that the Senate recede.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] moves that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 82. It occurs on page 22, line 23, after the word "expended," where the Senate inserted the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Attorney General of the United States shall, after submission to him by the Secretary of the Interior of a request for an opinion thereon, hold affirmatively that, in his opinion, the Indians under existing law are protected and confirmed in their water rights.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I think the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was not present at the time when we had a discussion of this question which lasted for a day; indeed, I do not know but that it lasted two or three days. The facts are that at that time the Senate, by a large majority, as I remember, decided that it did not care to increase the House appropriation from $100,000 to $250,000 as presented in the preceding amendment, unless some safeguards were thrown around the Indians, and after a long discussion it was decided to insert the amendment which the Senator now seeks to eliminate. Personally I do not know but there may be a better way than this, but I believe that before we increase the appropriation from $100,000 to $250,000 we ought to have some positive affirmative suggestion from the Senators from Montana as to how the Indians' rights may be safeguarded. I do not think it necessary that we go on and discuss this matter for another day, although it is a great big proposition, and I think we should not recede from this amendment unless some good reason is shown for doing so.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel sure the Senator from Vermont could not have been in when I took the time of the Senate for half an hour this morning in an endeavor to show that the amendment is absolutely without merit.

The Senator from Vermont correctly says that I was not present in the Senate at the time this amendment was incorporated in the bill. I have taken occasion to read the debate on the subject with great care, however, and I am fully apprised of what transpired at the time the amendment was incorporated in the bill. After reading the whole discussion I say to the Senator from Vermont that the amendment is absolutely meaningless; it does not signify anything at all. I have indicated to the Senate that there is no more reason for incorporating this provision in the bill in relation to the appropriation for the Flathead Indian Reservation than there is to introduce it in connection with an appropriation for any other reclamation project—those on the Blackfeet Reservation, the Fort Belknap Reservation, the reservations in the State of Arizona, the reservations in the State of New Mexico and in California. The rights of the Indians are just exactly the same upon the Flathead Indian Reservation as upon all the other reservations.

Moreover, Mr. President, I say again, because I desire to acquaint the Senator from Vermont in a general way with what I had to say about this matter, the Indians' rights to water, whatever they may be, are, of course, protected by the law. The Indian has the same right to appropriate water in the State of Montana as the white man. Even a Chinaman, I stated to the Senate, has a right to appropriate water in the State of Montana. Not only that, but the rights of the Indians upon the Flathead Reservation are safeguarded by reason of the fact that the Government has made an appropriation which takes care of every Indian who has taken his allotment under the irrigation project thereon. So there is absolutely nothing that the Attorney General can say in answer to the legal proposition which is submitted to him.

Mr. President, there may be many things in connection with the reclamation project on this particular Indian reservation, as upon all Indian reclamation projects, that might be corrected, but they are exactly the same upon the Flathead Indian Reservation as they are upon all others, and there is no reason why we should hold that particular appropriation up until abuses, if they exist, are corrected. The amendment has no place here at all.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment, and especially I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE]. It will serve as an explanation for the vote which I am about to cast upon this question.

Amendment numbered 82 was the subject of a prolonged and an illuminating discussion before the conference committee, and while the conferees did not agree and reported their disagreement to the Senate, the conferees inserted in the bill the following provision, which, I think, it is nothing but fair should be called to the attention of Senators. It will be found after the word "project," in line 15, of amendment numbered 3. The conferees inserted the following proviso:

Provided further, That, in addition to what is herein required—

The "herein required" above refers to the fact that there shall be an annual report on every irrigation project in any Indian reservation—

Provided further, That, in addition to what is herein required, there shall be submitted to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1914, as to the Uintah, Shoshone, Flathead, Blackfeet, and Fort Peck reclamation projects, a report showing the status of the water rights of the Indians and the method of financing said projects, together with such other information as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary for a full and complete understanding of all the facts and conditions in connection therewith.

In my opinion, those who desire amendment numbered 82 will get what they want by reason of having adopted this amendment, which the conferees have inserted, because by it the Interior Department of the Government is not called upon to state conclusions, the Attorney General is not called upon to give his opinion; but this amendment calls for the facts.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. PAGE. Do I understand that the Senator from Montana consents that amendment numbered 81, raising the amount from $100,000 to $250,000, may be abandoned, leaving $100,000 as the total sum appropriated at this time?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. I am very sorry the Senator from Vermont was not here. I took the time of the Senate a little while this morning, perhaps for 15 minutes, to explain why the amount ought to be at least $250,000.

Mr. PAGE. It may be true that I should have been here for a few minutes this morning to have heard the discussion, but it is also true that the Senator from Montana was away for a full day or two days when this matter was discussed at length, perhaps at as great length as any bill of minor importance has been discussed in the Senate during this session.

The Senators from Montana come here year after year and ask for double or triple the amount which the House has been willing to give for appropriations for this Flathead Indian irrigation project. I understand that amendment 81, increasing the amount from $100,000 to $250,000, is still a matter at issue before the conference committee. Am I right?

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. PAGE. If we are to leave the whole matter where the House left it, at $100,000, I have no objection to the elimination of the proposed amendment numbered 82. But if we are to increase the sum appropriated from $100,000 to $250,000, it seems to me that we ought not, after a few minutes' discussion this morning, set aside the results of our two or three days' deliberation upon this matter as it is now proposed to do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Montana spent 15 or 20 minutes in discussing it after an experience of 25 or 30 years, and the Senator from Vermont has had no such experience and there are other people who know less about it.

Mr. PAGE. I confess to what the Senator says, that I am not an expert on Indian matters, but I have been on this committee long enough to become very jealous lest we do not properly safeguard the rights of the Indians. I can not see for myself why anyone should object to having the Indians' rights safeguarded as is proposed in this amendment, even though the same provision has not been added to all other like appropriations made in this bill.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PAGE. One word and I will conclude. I want to read the amendment which we propose to strike out:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Attorney General of the United States shall, after submission to him by the Secretary of the Interior of a request for an opinion thereon, hold affirmatively that, in his opinion, the Indians under existing law are protected and confirmed in their water rights.

I do not care what has been done in regard to other water rights, but here is an amendment which, after a very long discussion, we thought it necessary to add, and for one I do not think we ought, certainly without a full discussion, to direct the conferees on the part of the Senate to abandon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In the Senator's opinion, what effect has this amendment upon the water rights of the Indians or upon any rights of the Indians?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not know that it has any effect, but at least I can not see that it does any harm. It is true that after a long discussion we sought for some protection to the Indians; we sought for some safeguarding of his rights; and this was the best amendment we were able to devise at that time, and I hate to see it abandoned.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was not here during the discussion of the bill as I ought to have been, of course. If the Senator will reflect a moment he will find that the only purpose the amendment could possibly fill is to call upon the Attorney General for an opinion as to the validity of a State law. The rights of Indians, the rights of white men, the rights of everybody, so far as their rights to the waters in the stream are concerned, depend entirely upon the enactment of the State legislature and do not depend in any degree or in any manner upon any law which we have passed here, as I understand it.

If that be true, then the Secretary of the Interior is simply calling upon the Attorney General for his opinion as to the construction of a State law as applied to these particular lands, and I can not see where that would be of any particular value to anybody. It would, of course, have the persuasive power of the opinion of any lawyer of good repute and of high degree.

Mr. PAGE. I can only answer the Senator by saying that while what he may say in regard to this matter is correct, that it is a subject entirely for the State to decide. Yet the Senate of the United States is called upon by an amendment here to add $150,000 to the appropriation made by the House. It is confessed that the Flathead Reservation is being mortgaged for water which the Indians may or may not receive the full benefit of. The subject was discussed at length here the other day, as the Senator probably knows, although he was not present, and it was then agreed by several Senators that a part of this appropriation ought to have been charged to another fund and that we should not go on year after year adding millions upon millions of dollars to this mortgage on the Flathead Indian lands because, as a matter of right, the Reclamation Service or reclamation fund ought to have borne a part of the expense.

I am sorry this matter comes up now, because at that time we had the very valuable assistance of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. They are both good lawyers and discussed the matter at length from a legal point of view. They were opposed to this addition of $150,000 unless something could be done to safeguard the Indians' rights, and as a result of a very full and illuminating discussion, it was decided to add this amendment. Perhaps, as the Senator says, it may not do any good; but I can not see that it will do any harm, and I do not see why we should abandon it, for it may do great good.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I discussed at some length the question which is involved in this amendment when the matter was before the Senate on the original bill, and I have no intention of repeating that argument. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], however, says that if this amendment does no good, it can do no harm. It may do a good deal of harm. Here is an irrigation project which will cost, as I am informed, somewhere from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 when it is completed. It will bring under cultivation an immense area of land by reason of the irrigation project, for which the Indians would otherwise be able to receive but a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half an acre. These lands will be sold for from six to ten dollars per acre, and, in addition to that, the white men who buy the lands and pay those increased prices will be obliged to pay their pro rata proportion of the cost of the irrigation project. In other words, the white men who buy the lands at the increased prices will still be obliged to pay for the water right which they use upon the lands, so that the Indians will receive an immense benefit from the construction of this enterprise.

The House proposed to appropriate $100,000 for the expenditure this year. In an enterprise of this vast extent $100,000 is a mere pittance—$250,000 is altogether too small an amount to appropriate. If this irrigation enterprise is to be completed at all, it ought to be completed as speedily as possible, and it is poor economy to confine the appropriations for an immense project of that kind to $50,000 or $100,000 or $200,000 per annum. We ought to be appropriating as large a sum each year as the constructors of the enterprise can economically use. I am informed, and I have no reason to doubt that it is true, that instead of using $250,000 they could well use $500,000.

Now, what is this proviso? It is—

That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Attorney General of the United States shall, after submission to him by the Secretary of the Interior of a request for an opinion thereon, hold affirmatively that, in his opinion, the Indians under existing law are protected and confirmed in their water rights.

I have no doubt of the power of Congress to limit an appropriation in any way it pleases, but this to my mind is the most remarkable limitation that has ever been put upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. In the first place, nobody is required to do anything. The appropriation is not to be expended unless the Attorney General of the United States shall render an opinion affirmatively with reference to these rights. Suppose he never renders an opinion, then the appropriation is never expended. All the work we have already done, amounting, I think, to more than a million dollars——

Mr. WALSH. To a million and a half dollars.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To a million and a half dollars—is lost. Not only is the Attorney General not required to render any opinion, but he can not render it unless the question is submitted to him by the Secretary of the Interior; and the Secretary of the Interior is not obliged to submit it to him. The language is "unless the Attorney General of the United States shall, after submission to him by the Secretary."

I do not know what the attitude of the Secretary of the Interior may be, but I can well imagine a case where he might be hostile to the amendment, and he could prevent the appropriation becoming available simply by inaction. Either of these officers can prevent it. There would have been some sense in the amendment—very little, I must say—if we had provided that the Attorney General should render an opinion.

Why do we want the interposition of the Secretary of the Interior in the matter? If the Secretary of the Interior does not choose for any reason that may appeal to him to submit the matter to the Attorney General, the Attorney General can not act. In that way the appropriation absolutely lapses and all the work that has been done upon this vast irrigation enterprise is lost. Even if the Secretary does submit the matter to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General does not choose to render an opinion, it is lost nevertheless, or if he delays for a great length of time the whole enterprise is halted, when it ought to be going on.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, let us assume that every sentence the Senator from Utah has uttered is absolutely true; let us face what we are doing here. Here is the Flathead Indian Reservation; the Indians own that land. We have adopted a project that looks to the mortgaging of the Indians' lands, as the Senator has well said, to the extent of from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000. The Indian comes to us and says, "I do not want that mortgage placed upon my land."

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask what Indian has ever said that?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I could go over the hearings, which occupied hours and hours and days and days before the committee, and tell the Senator from Montana, but I can not on the spur of the moment tell him.

Mr. MYERS. I defy the Senator from Vermont to point out where one Flathead Indian has ever objected to this project.

Mr. PAGE. My friend on my left the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] says I am correct about this.

Mr. MYERS. I should like the Senator from Vermont to point that out and read it.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Oregon says that the greater complaint was made as to other projects.

Mr. MYERS. All of it came from the Blackfeet project; there has been no complaint as to this project.

Mr. PAGE. But, Mr. President, here is a great project, and the men who are being called upon to mortgage their homes for this project are told that they must shut their mouths; that they can not have even an opinion from the Secretary of the Interior or the Attorney General assuring them that they are protected; that they must go on, whether they will or not, and let us mortgage their lands for $7,000,000, when the facts show that time after time we have made appropriations for these irrigation projects which have been failures. I do not know whether this project is good or bad.

Mr. MYERS. I should like the Senator to point out one of these projects that is a failure.

Mr. PAGE. I decline to yield for a moment. I decline to yield until I complete my sentence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. I do not know whether I am occupying the time of the Senator from Utah. If so, I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no. I was afraid the Senator was acquiring a vested right to the floor when he said he declined to yield. I yield to the Senator until he has finished.

Mr. PAGE. Very well. I say that we ought in some way to safeguard the rights of these Indians. The simplest thing we could conceive of was this little proviso that the Attorney General should be asked to investigate the matter; and if he said the rights of the Indians were not safeguarded, we should not increase this appropriation from one hundred thousand to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but should leave it as the House left it, at $100,000.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if he will kindly tell the Senate in what respect it is claimed that the water rights of the Indians are imperiled?

Mr. PAGE. In this respect, Mr. President: Here is an immense project. Everybody confesses that the greater benefits are going to the whites in almost all cases.

Mr. MYERS. I do not confess that.

Mr. PAGE. Other reclamation projects have been charged to the reclamation fund; but we know, and everybody confesses, that in appropriating this money we are mortgaging the Indian's land; we are mortgaging his logs, his lumber, everything that he has to pay it back; and we do not know whether or not the Indian is going to get any benefit out of it. So we say that before the Indian shall be called upon to make this sacrifice—to place this mortgage upon his premises—he shall have the poor right to ask the Attorney General if he is safeguarded; and if he is not safeguarded, then only $100,000 of his money shall be taken this year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the difficulty with this situation is that the amendment which the Senate put on does not and can not touch the subject referred to by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and that which is in the mind of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE]. The administration of the fund with reference to this irrigation project, the price fixed for the land, the disinclination of some of the Indians to leave the highlands and go to the lowlands and take their allotment on this irrigation project are practical questions about which, of course, and with reference to which, of course, no opinion of the Attorney General could have any bearing or relation whatever.

As to amendment No. 3, which was in controversy, we added in conference, and the House conferees agreed to it, a provision that, in addition to the report thereon called for with reference to Indian matters generally, the Department of the Interior should report specifically upon the Blackfeet and four or five other reservation irrigation projects.

I was in favor of adding to this provision an additional protection for the Indian with reference to the practical use of the water, a provision that there should be reserved for each Indian, whether he would leave the highlands now or not, an amount equal to 40 acres of this irrigable land, awaiting the time when he would see the wisdom and policy of exchanging a wide area upon the highlands for a desirable rich and valuable tract within the plan of irrigation.

Mr. PAGE. But that was not done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, I shall finish what I have to say, and then I shall yield the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. That was not done because we reported a disagreement; but I have no doubt that we can do that.

The amendment under discussion does not bear upon the question of practical administration at all; it simply goes to the legal question, involving an interpretation of the law of Montana, and may in the delay incident to receiving that opinion seriously interfere with the progress of the work of the summer, and in that way work an injury to the Indians. While I would be in favor of placing in this bill a provision, which I believe we can, reserving to each one of the Indians who has taken his allotment on the high lands a 40-acre tract, I believe that unintentionally we are likely to injure that project and work harm to the rights of these Indians in relation to securing and saving their water rights by postponing the continuation of this work pending the receipt of an opinion by the Attorney General upon a pure legal question that every one concedes, I think, is not and can not be involved in this matter. Therefore, I shall have to differ from my friend from Vermont, whose opinion I certainly hold in high regard, and whose zeal in the interest of the Indian and all other matters of legislation with which he comes in contact is beyond question; and I shall vote that the conferees be authorized to recede from this amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has said about this matter, and I judge from the expression on the face of my friend from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] that the Senator from Minnesota has succeeded in convincing him where I have failed.

Mr. President, Senators who represent the Western States ought to be given credit for understanding the various problems that are peculiar and local to those States, among them the Indian problem. We who represent those States are quite as friendly to the Indians as are the Senators from the Eastern States, who never have seen a blanket Indian in their lives. We understand their needs; we sympathize with them. Our legislatures are passing acts which are intended to preserve their rights. In my own State we have passed an act, general in terms it is true, as it had to be under the constitution, but intended for the special benefit of the Indians, which will give them a period of 14 years within which to complete their appropriations of water. The time will not lapse until the year 1919, if I remember correctly. That is a right which has never been accorded to any white settlers and never been accorded to any irrigation company in the State. Under the general law of appropriations the right must be complete within five years. We have extended the law for the benefit of those Indians for 14 years.

We are quite as sensitive to their rights as is the Senator from Vermont. We understand the situation quite as well as do Senators who represent the Eastern States. It seems to me that at some time or other we ought to be given credit for some honesty of purpose about these matters. Whenever a question comes up with reference to the public lands of the West we are met with the opposition of Senators from the East who do not understand the problems by actual contact with them as do we. Our hands are tied; we are prevented from solving public-land questions and Indian questions as they ought to be solved, in my judgment, very often by the opposition of Senators from other parts of the country who, I think, with all due respect to them, do not understand them so well as do the Senators who represent the Western States understand them.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not think I want to stand here and talk about my own judgment or knowledge on Indian questions. For some six years I have been laboring faithfully in the Committee on Indian Affairs. If I should talk about what I know in connection with that committee it would not be creditable to some of the Senators from the Indian States, I am sorry to say, and I prefer to be excused from that.

I might say, however, Mr. President, that the Indian Affairs Committee, which consists of some 16 Senators, usually has 3, 4, 5, or 6 members present, and the Members from the Indian States usually appear before that committee when they have something to ask for their States. They leave it to others of us who are there all the time, finally to become a little suspicious that Senators from the Indian States are not always thoughtful of the Indians and are sometimes more thoughtful of their white constituents, who vote. I am sorry to have to state that, and I would not have stated it but for the fact that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] attacked me and said that I did not know anything about this matter because I live in the East. That is not a fair statement to make. I have tried to study this question with a good deal of care, and I want to say that, in my judgment, somebody from the East ought to have been here to protect the Indians when this plan was started.

Here was a project that ought to have been charged to the reclamation fund, at least as to half; but, instead of that, what has been done? Without anybody there to stand up and say, "Why do you do this?" with the rights of the poor Indian hanging in the balance, without anyone there to protect him, this great project, calling for the expenditure of from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000, has been placed upon his land as a mortgage, when Senators on this floor have stood up and stated that, in their judgment, a good part of the cost ought to have been charged to the reclamation fund. I think that is true.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not like to sit here and allow to go unchallenged the statement made by the Senator from Vermont, impugning, as it does, the representatives from my State charged with the performance of a public duty in this body. The Senator now states that somebody from the East ought to have been here to look after the interests of the Indian when this project was originated. He implies that it was started with a purpose to advantage the white people of my State at the expense of the Indian.

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WALSH. In just a moment. I rose to ask the Senator what basis of objection he has to the plan under which this project was inaugurated? It provides that the lands benefited by the project shall bear the burden of the expense. The lands of the white settlers under the project bear their proportion of the expense and the lands of the Indians under the project bear their proportion of the expense. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont what other plan he would like to have proceeded upon?

Mr. PAGE. I am very happy, indeed, to answer that question, and I will answer it in this way: The Indian bears his proportion of the expense and the white man his proportion of the expense, as the Senator states; but, Mr. President, here is a venture; here are $7,000,000 probably to be placed as a mortgage on Indian lands. If this whole scheme shall prove to be a success, then it is true the white man and the Indian share alike the burden, but if it is should prove a failure, it is a mortgage upon the Indian lands.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in what respect is it a mortgage on the Indian lands, and how are the Indian lands going to be seized? Are we to understand from the Senator from Vermont now that he has some kind of an idea that at some time in the future under some kind of a contingency a proceeding of foreclosure shall be instituted and the Indian's land sold out and taken away from him? Has he any such idea as that?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I will be most happy to be corrected if I am wrong, because it is the foundation of all I have to say, but I understand that all appropriations of this character are a mortgage upon the Indian's land. I want some one to tell me if I am wrong, because in all of the discussions in the committee that has been the foundation upon which we have discussed the matter; and if I am wrong, I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad to inform the Senator that he is wrong.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], on my left, says, "Yes; the funds are all reimbursable, of course." What do we mean by a reimbursable fund? Will the Senator from Montana please explain that term to me?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very glad to do so. A reimbursable fund means this: The Government makes the appropriation; the amount is reimbursed to the Government, so far as the settlers are concerned, by the settlers; they have to pay for their land so much a year. The amount coming from the Indian lands is taken from the Indian funds and reimbursed to the Government; so that out of the Indian funds the proportion of the expenditure chargeable against the Indian lands is taken, and the proportion assessable against the white man's land is paid by him.

Now, Mr. President, let me continue by saying that it should be perfectly understood that the Indians had the first right to select; they took their lands; they picked what they believed to be the richest lands under this irrigation project; and do not forget that they were wise enough to select judiciously, and they did. They secured the best land under this irrigation project, and the settlers got what was left; but, notwithstanding that, the settler pays exactly the same amount per acre as does the Indian. The Government appropriation is eventually reimbursed out of the Indian funds, so far as the amount is chargeable against the Indians.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the expenditures of the Government on this account do not constitute a lien upon the lands which are allotted to the Indians. The Government only will be reimbursed by the sale of other lands. The Indian never can, in response to this expenditure, be dispossessed of the land that has been allotted to him. It constitutes no lien upon that land whatever. The funds can only be reimbursed from the sale of land wholly outside of that which he has selected and which he is irrigating.

Mr. PAGE. Let me make one suggestion——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Vermont will pardon me for a moment, he will understand that the settlers are required to pay, in addition to the price of the land, the irrigation charges. If they are not under the irrigation system at all, they are obliged to pay anywhere from four to ten dollars an acre for this land. That goes into a fund for the benefit of the Indians. Not only that, but there are large tracts of valuable timber upon this reservation, and that timber will eventually be sold for the benefit of the Indians. None of it has been sold, except some small tracts. That money will go into a fund, and out of the fund thus accumulated of money that belongs to the Indians the amount chargeable against the Indian lands will eventually be taken to reimburse the Government.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President I do not want to be diverted from what I think is the straight line in this debate. It is unquestionably true, as the Senator says, that the lands, both of the white man and of the Indian, so far as they go, reimburse this fund; but I have been years sitting at the table of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and my good friend from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and the former Senator from Montana, Mr. Dixon, have told me, "We are not appropriating this from the Federal Treasury; it is reimbursable; the Indian has all of this to pay back"; and when the question has been asked, "Is this a lien upon the Indians' land, a lien upon the Indians' lumber?" the answer has universally been, "Certainly; this is not anything that comes from the Federal Treasury." Mr. President, if it does not come from the Federal Treasury——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. I ask the Senator to let me finish my sentence, please.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator has made an erroneous statement as to me.

Mr. PAGE. If it does not come from the Federal Treasury, and does not come from the Indians' lands, and there is not enough derived from the lands of the white settlers to pay it, who does pay it?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that I have ever stated before the Indian Committee that this money is all a lien on the Indians' lands or property; only so much of it is a lien as the Indians get the benefit from.

Mr. PAGE. Then, Mr. President, I think it is high time that the Senate understands the meaning of these words:

For continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Flathead Reservation, in Montana, and the unallotted irrigable lands to be or which have been heretofore disposed of under authority of law, including the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, $250,000, reimbursable—

When you add the word "reimbursable," does that mean that the money is taken from the Federal Treasury without——

Mr. MYERS. I never denied that, and it is all reimbursable.

Mr. PAGE. Reimbursable from what? First, from the lands that are sold to the whites?

Mr. MYERS. Both from the lands sold to and occupied by the whites, and also from the sale of property belonging to the Indians for their share.

Mr. PAGE. But if perchance there should be an insufficient sum out of the sales of the land to make good this appropriation, does not the word "reimbursable" mean that it is to be reimbursed out of any Indian funds belonging to the Indians of the Flathead Reservation?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not think so. If a man fails to make a payment on his land, he forfeits what he has paid and also the land; then it is sold to somebody else, and the fund is reimbursable from the next settler.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont will bear with me a moment?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. First, I want to call attention to a matter I spoke of when on my feet a moment ago. To amendment numbered 3, on page 5, we added this in conference:

Provided further, That in addition to what is herein required there shall be submitted to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1914, as to the Uintah, Shoshone, Flathead, Blackfeet, and Fort Peck reclamation projects, a report showing the status of the water rights of the Indians and the method of financing said projects, together with such other information as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary for a full and complete understanding of all the facts and conditions in connection therewith.

Mr. President, referring now to the reimbursable feature of these propositions, there is this to be said: Of course, whatever party is in power, they are always anxious that the general appropriations made by Congress shall appear no larger than is necessary, so that it is often urged in committee and on the floor that an appropriation is reimbursable, in order that it may be urged in the final summary of the appropriations of the session that out of all these appropriations there is a certain percentage that is coming back and must not be charged up to the party in power.

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator please tell me what the word "reimbursable" means, if it does not mean that we take it from the Indians' funds?

Mr. CLAPP. That is just what I am getting at. There is in all these provisions a certain element of uncertainty. Let me correct the Senator here by saying that while we use the word "reimbursable," that does not create a lien upon the allotted area that the individual Indian takes, but there is a lien upon the allotted area that the white man secures. Out of the general fund of the Indian tribes is to come what may be necessary to bear the cost of the irrigation project after there has been deducted from the project the amount that the white man pays for the irrigated land which he secures, and after there has been deducted the amount that is received by the Government for the land primarily sold to the white man. Of course, if an irrigation project should fail, then, as to the residue that is left if the Indian tribe had the property, it would come out of that property. On the other hand, it is also true that if the Indian tribe had no property, then the Federal Government would be the loser.

These irrigable lands lie there adjacent to water, which may be secured under certain laws involving the application and use of the water. These Indians, living there, are interested and benefited if an irrigation project can be developed in which they will take their small areas of irrigated land, and in the end the lands sold to the white man and the cost of putting water on the white man's land and the fund of the Indian tribe will meet all these costs and expenses. On the other hand, the Indian is likewise benefited if he can get irrigation and get his small allotment of irrigated land free from lien, even though in the last analysis the Indian fund might not be sufficient to recompense the Government.

There is, therefore, an element of uncertainty on both sides of a project of that kind; and it has been thought best, wherever Congress could be led to see the wisdom of it, to initiate these projects and make them in terms reimbursable, although everyone recognizes that if in the last analysis the Indian fund should be insufficient to meet the final residuum of cost, then there would be a loss to the Federal Government. It is a sort of compensatory proposition. Some risk is taken as to the Indian property. Some risk is taken as to the Federal Treasury. The only question is as to the wisdom or unwisdom of any individual project.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAPP. I have not the floor to yield, but——

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Minnesota, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Is there any limitation placed upon this reimbursement where the money has been expended by the Government to build these dams? In other words, the appropriation is made, and it is expected that the Government shall be reimbursed. Is there a time fixed when this reimbursement is to be made from the sale of the lands to the white people and whatever other course the funds may come from?

Mr. CLAPP. Ordinarily there is no time fixed at the outset, except as to what the white man pays. That time is fixed in a series of years. Of course those dealing with the matter have in contemplation, if there is an existing fund, the existing fund. If there is property in excess of the lands sold under the irrigation project to the white man, they have in contemplation the ultimate sale of that property. In this particular project, after taking out what the white men will pay for their allotments—and they have to take theirs after the Indians have taken their allotments—and then taking out the price which the white man pays for the land, I do not at present recall whether there is an existing fund to the tribal credit of this tribe or not.

Mr. PAGE. I think there is.

Mr. CLAPP. But I do not know that this tribe, the Blackfeet, have a very large amount of timberland, and I think they have a fund. As this work proceeds and reaches its completion, of course if there is a fund on hand that is not bound by any treaty regulation, unquestionably Congress could then pass an act reimbursing the residuum that is left after you have taken out of the cost of the irrigation what you have gotten from the white man, first through the land itself and then through the water right.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to say that the condition is this: It is as if some person took your property and mortgaged it and all your effects and belongings and inaugurated a business scheme on it without consulting you as to whether or not you wanted it, and then carried it on upon what he thought was a wise plan.

It might prove to be or it might not, and yet you would have to pay for it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is not that usually the case in case of guardianship?

Mr. LANE. Yes. That, I think, is the meat of the whole question, and that is exactly how it has been carried on, and I think it accounts for the condition of the Indian at this time.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course the theory upon which the Government has proceeded in the past has been that of guardian or trustee for the Indian, and except in the most informal way the Indian as a rule has not been consulted. He is always consulted in a certain manner as to the things which he asks for, because the Indian or his representative comes before the committees of Congress.

How wise, how just it is to deal with these people in the manner in which we have dealt with them is a question, but it is a question which has been settled at least in harmony with the general spirit and purpose of the American people from the beginning of this Government. It has been administered by such men as ex-Senator Platt, of Connecticut, and by the great Senator Morgan, of Alabama. The Indian Committee has had its representation east and west, north and south. That mistakes may have been made no one can deny. When you realize, however, that a few years ago these people were savages, wearing blankets and living in tepees, and that we have had to carry them across from that condition to a condition—many of them now—of civilization, of self-reliance, of ability for self-support; when you realize that we have had to do this at arm's length, and when you realize that every step has been necessarily experimental, for there were no guides to go by, I, for one, feel that the Department of the Interior, the Indian Office, and Congress in the main may well congratulate themselves upon the result of this work.

It is very easy to say that inattention has marked the progress of legislation; but, Mr. President, in the years that have gone, and in the continual exchange of one person for another upon the committee, some of the great men who have honored this Chamber in the past by their presence here have been the vigilant members of that committee, notably the two men whom I name, ex-Senator Platt, of Connecticut, and ex-Senator Morgan, of Alabama.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, perhaps I should say that the remark of the Senator from Utah to the effect that the Senators from the East should be seen and not heard, that they are not prepared to act intelligently upon these Indian matters, ought not to have irritated me, and I guess it did not very much; but I, perhaps, said a little more than I would have said had not that remark been indulged in by the Senator from Utah. I certainly meant no disrespect to any Senator.

The remarks of my good friend the Senator from Minnesota are fine, but it seems to me that we are still running away from the foundation of this contest, and that is this: Are all these appropriations which are remibursable a mortgage upon the Indian's property?

I made that statement in good faith. I thought I was correct. The Senator from Montana arose in his place and said: "You are mistaken." The Senator from Minnesota then arose and said: "It is true that this fund which is termed 'reimbursable' is reimbursable, first, from moneys received from the white man for purchased lands; second, from other specified sources; third, from the Indian's money in the United States Treasury." If he has a fund in the Treasury, and I understand he has, that fund, as I understand it, is mortgaged for this $7,000,000 that we propose to invest in this Flathead irrigation project. It is true that when we have exhausted the Indian's money, if there is nothing left, the United States stands the balance of the loss, as the Senator says.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the tone might indicate that he was out entirely. It must be remembered that in that transaction the Indian has his allotment of irrigated land, of which he can not be divested.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, we do not differ upon that point. Of course the Indian gets his plat of irrigated land, and the Senator from Minnesota says that he would increase the size of that plat so that he might be better protected; but the fact still remains that without his consent we are placing a $7,000,000 mortgage upon his property. He has a large amount of timbered lands, and I do not think there is any question but that the proceeds of the logs on these lands, when they are cut, must first go to pay any debts which the Indian owes under these reimbursable appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have had some thirty-odd years of experience among the Indians of the western country. I am not surprised at the attitude the Senator takes, and I would not have him feel as he seems to have felt from the remarks made by the Senator from Utah. The Senator recognizes that the Indian is a ward of the Government. The Senator should likewise recognize that Congress, as far as the Indian is concerned, must take care of the ward of the Government through its legislation.

The Senator constantly speaks of "the Indian's consent." You might as well talk to me about the consent of a baby or a lunatic who has a guardian. The Senator constantly speaks of "the Indian's consent." How are you going to get it? Are you going to run out on the plains and lasso him and bring him in and get his consent?

The Senator does not know the Indian. He knows all he hears before the committee, and he forms very just conclusions from what he hears there; but how are you going to get the consent of an Apache Indian, and what does an Apache Indian know about whether or not that is the best thing for him to have?

The Government has made the Indian its ward. If you will just leave out the question of getting the Indian's consent and talk about the consent of the guardian of the Indian, your argument may be logical; but inasmuch as we have constituted ourselves the Indian's guardian, we must not expect to wait to get the consent of the baby.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not know that I correctly understood the answer or response of the Senator from Montana to my suggestion that this was a mortgage upon the Indian's land, but I certainly understood him to say that I was mistaken. If I am, I should like to have him tell me how, and I will listen attentively to what he says.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have before me here a compilation of all acts of Congress with relation to the Flathead Reservation and the opening thereof. The Senator——

Mr. PAGE. I trust I may not be diverted from my argument. I should like to have the Senator say to me whether or not this "reimbursable" fund really constitutes a mortgage upon the Indian's property?

Mr. WALSH. I was about to say to the Senator that the term "mortgage" has no sort of appropriate application to the subject at all. I endeavored to express to the Senator the idea that a mortgage contemplates that in case of a default the property shall be sold and taken away. There is not a possibility of taking away any of these lands from the Indians.

Now, let me continue by saying that the word "reimbursable," as used here, simply means that it is expected that eventually the General Treasury will be reimbursed, so far as the burden rests upon the Indian lands, from any moneys that go into the Indian funds. The settler, as I indicated before, pays for his lands in installments; but it is thought that the Indian will not be able thus to meet the expenses of irrigation work, and the payments will be made on his account out of moneys that go into the Indian fund, derived, as has been stated by the Senator from Minnesota, from the sale of the other lands to the white settlers and to other people.

Mr. PAGE. And not from any other source?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not.

Mr. PAGE. Is not any fund that may come from the sale of the Indian's lumber or timber from his reservation later on a fund which must go to reimburse the Government for what it pays out here?

Mr. WALSH. Why, unquestionably. The Indian has resources here. He owns the lands that the white settlers take up. Moneys will come from those. He owns the timberlands; moneys will eventually come from those. He owns the mineral lands; moneys will eventually come from those. All of that money will go into an Indian fund, and the portion of this expense that is chargeable to the Indian will be taken out of that fund and turned back into the General Treasury to reimburse the Treasury.

Mr. PAGE. Has not the Blackfoot Indian a large fund now in the Treasury?

Mr. WALSH. My recollection is vague about that. I do not know how much it is.

Mr. PAGE. Several hundred thousand dollars, I think.

Mr. WALSH. I think so. Whatever the Indian has, it is entirely appropriate that the amount should be from time to time taken from that fund to pay his proportion of the reclamation project.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To improve his estate.

Mr. WALSH. It does not make any difference whether it is taken out of funds that are now in the Treasury belonging to him or funds which may afterwards come into the Treasury from the sale of timberlands.

Mr. PAGE. Then, as a matter of fact, these funds which are reimbursable are a lien upon the proceeds of the lands sold to the white man; a lien upon the Indian's logs and lumber which are taken from his tract of land; and a lien upon his funds in the Federal Treasury. While perhaps not a mortgage in the strict legal sense of the term, yet it is a lien which compels him to stand all the risk growing out of this irrigation scheme.

Mr. WALSH. Risk in what way?

Mr. PAGE. The risk is this, as I understand it: There are several of these schemes that have not proven to be successful. If they are successful, of course nobody loses; but if unsuccessful, it is the Indian's loss. And here is a $7,000,000 risk that we are compelling the Indian to assume. I think it was agreed here by those who discussed this matter the other day that a part of this burden ought to have been regarded as a reclamation project and to have been paid for out of the reclamation fund, certainly that the risk ought not all to have been placed upon the Indian.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, who ever suggested that under that particular proposition it should come from the irrigation fund under the irrigation law? It is absolutely out of the pale of that law. It has nothing in the world to do with it.

Mr. PAGE. But it is claimed—and I think truthfully—that when this project started, instead of being started solely as an Indian project, it ought to have been started in part as an Indian project and in part as a reclamation project. I drew that idea from the discussion in the Senate the other day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will pardon me, in effect it is the same thing, for under every irrigation project the very same conditions exist that existed in this case—that the man who gets the water pays for it. The Government, acting for the Indian, thinks it is best for its ward's estate to appropriate this Indian land and sell part of it to the white people, to appropriate the proceeds of that timber. The guardian, acting for the ward, to improve the Indian's estate, does that, and that is all there is in it. This question of mortgaging the holding is not to the point. It is a man acting for his children who says, "I think this is the best thing I can do for your estate"; and it is, if you can ever get an Indian to do any agricultural work at all, which I have always doubted. I believe it is largely visionary.

While the Senator from Minnesota was mentioning the distinguished gentlemen who had presided over the Committee on Indian Affairs, his modesty prevented him from giving himself a conspicuous place, to which I know he is entitled. He knows this question as well as any man in the Senate. He knows that it is all problematical. Why should the Senator from Vermont or anyone else take up the whole time of the evening over a question of mortgages as between a ward and its guardian, when the Government, acting for the best interests of the Indian, feels that this is the best thing it can do for him, and the committee feels the same way? Why should we say, "Now, there is something wrong away back yonder; there is some mortgage on an Indian's estate"?

There is nothing in the world except as though it had been under one of the irrigation projects. Naturally, every man that gets water pays for it. The Indian must do it; and if the Indian does do it, and the project succeeds, it is worth twice what he has to pay for it. What is he going to do with his timber if he does not give it for water? What is he going to do with his land if he does not sell part of it to get water for the more valuable land in the bottom?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am intruding on the time of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to ask, in the line of what the Senator has mentioned, is it not a fact that in practically all of these cases—I do not know exactly how it was on this reservation, but in practically all these cases where the irrigation enterprise is started—without irrigation the land is practically worthless?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why, the Indian's estate on that reservation, if it is like the reservation in my own State, is not worth spending one minute of the time of the Senate in talking about. The Indian would never get a cent of profit from it in 500 years. This is an effort to bring it from a state of desert into a situation where you can give him a home, and, if possible, make a civilized human being out of him; and then we find opposition to it under the pretense that we are trying to take something from him. The Senator from Vermont opposes it in the tenderness of his heart, which I congratulate him upon entertaining. I congratulate him upon his sympathy with the Indians, in which I indulge, perhaps, more than he, because I know their condition better. In trying to help them, however, you will injure them if you carry out the plan which you are speaking about.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not think I will offer any apology for the time I take in addressing the Senate. Every Senator knows that in the six years I have been here I have never uttered an unnecessary word to take the time of the Senate. I have never occupied the time of the Senate unless the subject before it was one upon which I thought it my duty to speak. I never have spoken for the purpose of hearing myself talk. I realize my own limitations too well for that.

But here is a question where, the other day, I found myself supported by a goodly line of able Senators. As I said, there was the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and has studied this matter with a great deal of care; the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who gave this particular question a great deal of consideration, and their remarks were very able and illuminating. They are now necessarily absent, and I seem to be called upon to make my protest alone, as best I may, against a large array of able lawyers.

I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that if there is any fair, square, plain meaning to the word "mortgage" or "lien," this word "reimbursable" in this bill covers it. The Indian's land can not be taken, perhaps, in the sense that you could take a white man's land on a foreclosure of mortgage; but his property generally, his large fund in the Treasury, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, if I remember rightly, and his timber, logs, and lumber can be taken. I fear we are putting the Indian's money into a scheme that may prove a failure, and I am not willing to do it.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator a question there. Really, then, what he wants, apparently, is some general legislation that will apply to all the different reclamation projects?

Mr. PAGE. I have to say, in regard to that, that when this matter was under discussion the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was invoked to show that when Montana entered into the Union the act by which she became a member of the sisterhood of States provided, not in actual terms, but by inference or implication, that a sufficient quantity of water from the lake which supplies the Blackfoot Reservation belonged to this reservation and to the Indians. On the other hand, the Senator from Utah and other able Senators said: "No; the plain language of the Supreme Court of the United States in this case is not good law. It was obiter. They decided something that was not before them."

Those of us who were trying to safeguard the Indian's rights realized then that we confronted a bad proposition, one in which we did not know whether the Indian was or was not protected, and so this amendment was added.

Perhaps in closing I ought to apologize to the Senate for taking up so much of its valuable time, but I felt that we ought not to abandon this amendment. I am pretty well satisfied, however, that the weight of the argument may be against me, and I will not longer continue the unequal contest.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I call for the question. It will be remembered that this amendment was discussed at great length and with much ability, and was disposed of in the previous debate. We consumed, I think, practically three days on it then. I call for the question.

Mr. JONES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] occasioned by illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the motion to recede from amendment numbered 82 on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to say for the information of the Senate that in the last analysis the question amounts to just this: Here are guardians who give no bond and nowhere are held responsible for what they do who handle the funds and properties of these wards, these helpless wards, in a manner which throughout the United States has brought no credit upon this Government. If there are any rights belonging to them which are undetermined, it is well enough to ask the opinion of the Attorney General as to what those rights are and to protect them from the sale of their lands at a price far below what the whites could sell it for within 24 hours if they desired after they acquired possession of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recede from amendment numbered 82.

Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily away from the city on business. In matters pertaining to this bill, however, I am expressly relieved from my pair, and I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but under the terms of it I can vote on this question. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 7, as follows:

So the Senate receded from its amendment No. 82.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona desire to have the Senate further insist upon the amendments still in disagreement and to move for a further conference?

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to have the sense of the Senate on the amendments upon which we have been unable to agree. We have been instructed on amendment No. 82 and we would like to be instructed on the others.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate conferees be instructed to adhere to amendment No. 81.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I think a word will save a lot of time as to amendment No. 81. The House made an appropriation of $100,000 to continue the construction of the irrigation work on the Flathead Indian Reservation. The reclamation official came before us and stated that he ought to have $500,000. I am profoundly convinced that we should not recede from Senate amendment No. 81, which appropriates $250,000 instead of $100,000.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has moved to adhere to a certain amendment. The Senator perhaps did not intend to adhere, but to further insist.

Mr. WALSH. To further insist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Montana is that the Senate further insist upon its amendment No. 81.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that by the Senate voting to adopt the report of the conferees we virtually agreed to all the amendments which have been agreed to by the conferees and disagreed to the amendment on which they have reported a disagreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is just one amendment—numbered 82—that it is proposed now to further insist upon, and then the question will arise on insisting upon the other amendments which are in disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that a general motion ought to be made that the Senate further insist upon its remaining amendments and request a further conference. I do not see anything to be gained by taking up the amendments piecemeal.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the usual motion.

Mr. WALSH. In that case, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. ASHURST. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona moves that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments which are in disagreement and request a further conference with the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. ASHURST, Mr. LANE, and Mr. CLAPP conferees on the part of the Senate.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the trade commission bill, which is the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is my purpose to discuss in a general way some matters relating to and affected by the proposed legislation which the Senate now has under consideration.

We are quite apt to suggest when considering legislation of any moment that it is of paramount importance. In many cases this superlative language is not justifiable, but I think that it is appropriate in its application to the pending bill. The United States more than any other country has already adopted legislation relating to business organizations limiting and curbing their operations.

The whole question of what should be the Government's connection with corporations and combinations of capital should be the result of a most thorough, painstaking, and exhaustive examination. We do not legislate, in such matters at least, with the same care and prudence exhibited by our commercial rivals, and especially by the German Nation. It is well known that before adopting their present tariff law a commission studied the subject for several years, taking up every phase of the question, so that its report contained a substantially clear course to be followed. We should do the same in this case. I do not wish to unduly criticize the committees which have been engaged in framing this legislation, but what we are doing now is done without the aid of technical knowledge. Business men themselves are not agreed as to the proper solution of the question at issue. Presumably they have only looked at the question from their own important and perhaps selfish standpoint. They may be influenced to advocate a trade commission with limited powers, believing that that would practically break down the operation of the Sherman Antitrust Act or they may be opposed to a trade commission because they think it would hamper and restrict their business operations. They do not know any better than the legislators who are engaged in framing this legislation what the result of its enactment will be.

During the past 18 months I have been a member of a commission to study the rates which the Government should pay railroads for the transportation of mail. Without going into that question in any detail, I can state with propriety and positiveness that when this question was undertaken neither the railroads nor the Post Office Department had information which would have been even a reasonable basis for the construction of a law; in fact, both the railroads and the department have been studying this question through hearings, interrogatories, and investigations during these months, and both department and railroads have modified, in fact, radically changed, their views, the department at least, several times during that period.

If legislation had been adopted without the careful investigation which has been made during these months, I am justified in saying that it would have been unfair and unreasonable either to the Government or to the railroads themselves, or both; but as a result of this investigation I believe it will be demonstrated that a plan has been developed which will be fair to both Government and railroads and which will settle this question for many years to come.

We have on the statute books the Sherman Antitrust Act, which is praised by those who have approved of the results of its operation, and condemned by those who believe that the results obtained are not commensurate with the damage they feel it has done. Now we are proposing to take further action relating to similar businesses in an entirely different way, so that corporations hereafter will be materially limited in the manner in which they may conduct their operations.

There are those—and they are not confined to those who have the so-called conservative habit of thought—who believe that any legislation which restricts business operations is in the end detrimental to the best interests of the country.

We are always passing legislation which is made necessary by the joy rider, and by making it general it applies to everyone else. There are comparatively few people owning and operating automobiles who do not observe and believe in observing reasonable regulations, but a few operate their machines in a manner which endangers public interests and personal safety, and therefore it becomes necessary to pass legislation which will punish these irresponsible people; this legislation is very frequently much more drastic than is necessary or desirable but it must be applied to all those who are using machines. This illustration is equally true of general business and business operations.

Daniel Webster, in 1838, recognized the sentiment with which we are familiar, a general criticism of things as they are—a complaint that things are not right; and every complainant has a remedy at hand which, he believes, if put on the statute books will right these wrongs. Mr. Webster said at that time:

> There are persons who constantly clamor. They complain of oppression, speculation, and the pernicious influence of accumulated wealth. They cry loudly against all banks and corporations and all means by which small capitals become united in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on mad hostility against all established institutions. They would choke the fountain of industry and dry all the streams. In a country of unbounded liberty they clamor against oppression. In a country of perfect equality they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where property is more evenly divided than anywhere else, they rend the air shouting agrarian doctrines. In a country where the wages of labor are high beyond parallel they would teach the laborer that he is but an oppressed slave.

It seems to me there are many things in common in the conditions as described by Mr. Webster and those of the present time. I do not refer entirely in making that suggestion to this pending legislation but to the general trend of the public mind.

We sometimes get the impression from those who are condemning the management of large business affairs that the men who are conducting important corporations are endeavoring to find some way to circumvent the law. Such assertions, in my judgment, are generally without foundation. Nine hundred and ninety-nine business men out of every thousand are law-abiding citizens who wish to observe and respect the law in spirit and letter and are frequently put to great expense and trouble in determining what they can do and obey the law, but not to avoid its provisions. Every corporation of relative importance which has been conducting a large part of any special line of activity in the last 20 years has found it necessary to employ trained and expert lawyers not to tell its managers how they could avoid obeying the Sherman antitrust law, but to tell its managers what they could do and keep within its provisions. Very frequently the decisions of the courts have demonstrated that the opinion of the lawyers in such cases has not been sound, and that has brought fines and humiliation to many men who never intended to do any act which the law forbade.

In other words, there has been uncertainty in business opefations, which is always a serious embarrassment. What business wants, both capital and labor, is stability in the conduct of its operation. It is not possible to run all business concerns at their full capacity all the time, because when that course is followed overproduction is sure to result, which in turn necessitates a slowing up, and when that slowing up comes, in order to keep their plants running, their forces employed, and not to break up their organization, business men cut prices and take other action to sell their output, which they do not do when there is an active demand for their product. This in turn embarrasses the weaker competitor, who may and quite likely does go to the wall, so that that kind of action instead of producing real competition lessens competition by driving a certain percentage of producers out of business and enabling those who can weather the unusual times to obtain a monopoly of the good times which are sure to follow. If we could regulate the output of certain lines of goods so that each concern should manufacture in proportion to its capacity its part of the total demand at all times real competition would be the result, and that was what was attempted in the early days of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which I shall discuss a little more fully to show how important it is to carefully consider any business legislation which is going to affect the corporations of our country.

Various, in not all cases consistent, reasons are advanced for the passage of this legislation. For example, it is claimed, in a minority report which was made on the trade-commission bill in the House, that business is carried on by larger and larger units and that—> they have been able to drive their competitors out of business not by superior efficiency in the manufacturing of their product, but by securing special advantages and contracts in the buying of their raw materials and in the distribution and selling of their products. Any advantage large corporations have over small corporations or individuals through lower costs of production they are entitled to, but they should be prevented from an unfair use of the power that comes from their size alone.

That is a very common complaint, and yet there is a distinct limit to the possibilities which may come from size alone. We have recently seen that illustrated in the largest commercial failure which ever took place in the United States. The H. B. Claflin Co. for 40 years has been a synonym for successful business conducted under the highest possible ethics. As time went on the firm established branches in many cities. These branches, however, were conducted under other names, though the capital was largely, if not entirely, furnished by the main concern.

The business went on extending until the obligations of the Clafflin Co. aggregated from thirty to forty millions of dollars. They were very largely the notes of the branch houses, indorsed by the main house, making what is considered in trade double-name paper. As a matter of fact, the failure of the main house, followed by the failure of many of the branches, demonstrates that very largely, at least, it was only single-name paper, and that the banks in making loans to this concern had not been fully informed as to the character of the receivables. No one knows yet just what produced the failure or how serious the losses will be, but it is pretty clearly demonstrated that here was a business which under the very best auspices, with branches of its own throughout the country, has failed for one of two reasons: Either there was an overextension of credit, which does not seem to be borne out by the last financial reports which were made public, or a failure in the capacity of the management of the business. My own judgment is that it will be found that this business became so extended that some parts of it were not well managed; the genius which might have conducted the local store and the business carried on within suitable limitations with the success which had accompanied the firm's affairs during the earlier period of its existence had not been able to extend this careful management over the entire United States, and I am confident that if a careful inquiry were made it would be demonstrated that, except in cases where natural products are involved, as in the notable cases of the Standard Oil Co. and United States Steel Co., that there is a limit beyond which expansion can not take place without pretty nearly a certainty of a breakdown resulting. But even in the case of the steel and oil statistics demonstrate that they have not grown at the expense of their rivals, but the reverse has been the case.

I have here some statistics on the steel company which I wish to put in the RECORD. Before doing so I will explain the point which I wish to illustrate to demonstrate the correctness of what I have just said.

In 1902, which was the year after the organization of the United States Steel Co., it produced in all districts 45 per cent of the total iron ore of the country.

Last year it produced 47.92 per cent, and I believe that that is the only percentage where there has been an increase in the 10 years to which I am referring in making comparisons in comparison with what other companies have done.

Shipments from the lake region in 1902 by the United States Steel Co. were 60.4 per cent of the total. Last year they were 50.46 per cent. Pig iron, including spiegeleisen, produced by the company in 1902 was 44.03. In 1912 it was 38.01. Spiegeleisen and ferromanganese, and so forth, in 1902 was 81 per cent of the total; in 1912 it was 80.82 per cent; Bessemer and open-hearth ingots and castings in 1902 were 65.7; in 1912 they were 54.08 per cent. Bessemer steel rails produced in 1902 were 65.4 per cent of the total; in 1912 they were 56.27 per cent. Structural shapes in 1902 were 57.9 per cent of the total; last year they were 49.83 per cent. Plates and sheets in 1902 were 59.4 per cent of the total; last year they were 50.37 per cent. The total finished rolled product in 1902 was 50.08 per cent of the whole; last year it was 48.52 per cent.

Wire nails produced in 1902 were 65 per cent of the total; last year they were 49.30 per cent. Since that time the company has taken up the manufacture of tin plates and terne plates. In 1908, the first year this product was manufactured, it did 72 per cent of the total business; last year it did 60.07 per cent. I ask, Mr. President, to include those figures in more detail in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the same result is true of the Standard Oil Co., both in the production of oil and the consumption of oil. The Standard Oil Co. is really not primarily a producer of oil, but it is a refiner. While I have not been able to get the complete figures from the Bureau of Corporations since 1906, I ask permission to include these figures, which I have in detail, in my remarks.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. It is nearly a quarter after 3 o'clock. This is not the lunch hour; and I see only six of the majority here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Gronna	Page	Smoot
Brady	Hollis	Perkins	Stone
Brandegee	Hughes	Pomerene	Sutherland
Bryan	Jones	Ransdell	Swanson
Camden	Kenyon	Reed	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Shafroth	Thornton
Chilton	Lane	Sheppard	Tillman
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Shields	Weeks
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Shively	West
Crawford	Lewis	Simmons	White
Culberson	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Cummins	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. WEEKS. In 1889, the first year that the Standard Co. produced oil, it produced 17 per cent of the total oil of the country; in 1899 it produced 30 per cent; last year it produced 11 per cent, or 6 per cent less than the first year of its operations.

Its refining results, however, are even more striking. In 1882, the first year the combination was in operation, it refined 56 per cent; it refined a varying amount, in some years very much more than in others; but 10 years later it refined 81 per cent. Ten years later, in 1902, it refined 60 per cent, and in 1906 but 53 per cent. There have been many years during the organization of the Standard Oil Co. when it has refined as much as 90 per cent of the oil refined in this country.

In 1905 the independent companies refined more than did the Standard Oil Co., refining, all told, 71,682,435 barrels, as against 60,030,736 barrels refined by the Standard Oil Co.

These illustrations are given, Mr. President, for the purpose of indicating that the big companies are not growing bigger in all cases; in fact, I do not find any instance where exceedingly large companies are growing at the expense of independent outside interests. There is a limit to bigness, and that limit will be reached by the area covered in the operations of a company or the character of the management. No one man can, in my judgment, conduct a business outside of the limits where he can give his personal supervision and his care to its development.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Are not really some of the companies which are termed independent companies subsidiary companies to the so-called Standard Oil Trust?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have not examined those figures with that in view, and I do not know. I took them as they were furnished by the Bureau of Corporations. In the case of the United States Steel Co., however, this allowance should be made, that since the original figures—those of 1902—which I submitted the steel company has taken over the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co.; but, notwithstanding it took over that company, which I think was probably the second largest producer in the country at the time, the United States Co. has fallen off in its proportionate part of the business, as compared with outside concerns. I take it for granted that the figures included under the head of "Independent" have no connection with the main company, but I do not know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Massachusetts has presented figures showing that the output of great combinations, such as the Steel Trust and the Oil Trust, as compared with that of independents, has diminished of late years rather than increased.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Has the Senator any figures tending to show whether during this period of increased output upon the part of the independents the prices of the products have diminished or increased, or whether they have remained the same?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not gone into that. As the Senator from Nevada can see, my whole purpose in submitting these statistics, which relate to companies which are dealing in a natural product, where the public supposes that they control very largely the business of the country, is to show that even in those cases independent competition is now developing at the expense of the larger companies, and that there is a limit to the size which corporations can reach and be successful.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the statistics that the Senator from Massachusetts has given with regard to the United States Steel Corporation are correct; at least, they accord with my own investigation; but the Senator will not have forgotten the statement made by Mr. Gary, I think before one of the committees, that the United States Steel Corporation did fix the price at which all these commodities were sold—I mean not only those which were manufactured by it, but those manufactured by its rivals. It is big enough to dominate absolutely the trade. So Mr. Gary himself declared, and I think it has been so stated by several other men connected with that corporation. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will recognize that.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that that is largely true; but that does not disprove the correctness of the fact which I have tried to point out, that independent operation is vigorous in this country, and that it is actually gaining on the business of the larger concerns.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The reason for my inquiry was this: We often hear it stated that as the monopoly power of these great corporations diminishes by reason of independent production the prices have risen. The reason which is given for that is that so long as great combinations are under the charge of being monopolies they are under the restraint of a public opinion which influences them to give more reasonable prices than when they are relieved of that charge, and that, as the independent production increases and these corporations are relieved to that extent of the charge of monopoly in the business, that relief has resulted in giving them the opportunity to charge increased prices in the place of the old lower prices.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it is true that all prices have increased. I think prices have varied, dependent somewhat on business conditions. We all know that the general trend of prices has been upward, and undoubtedly in many respects they will continue to increase, because the amount of material which is available in proportion to the amount used is relatively decreasing. Take the price of beef, if you like. There is every reason why the price of beef should be higher from year to year, because statistics show that the number of the cattle in the United States is not increasing, while every year we have a million additional mouths to feed. I predict that we shall find in 10 years from now the prices of beef will be materially higher than they are to-day. For that reason I should not want to subscribe entirely to the statement which the Senator from Nevada has just made.

Mr. President, this bill provides that unfair and oppressive competition is to be unlawful and provides a commission to enforce the law. Whether competition is fair or oppressive is a question of fact to be decided by the commission in a similar manner to the way in which the Interstate Commerce Commission determines whether a railroad rate is unreasonably unfair. It is a very simple matter to fix railway rates compared with the powers and duties which are provided for in this bill for the proposed trade commission; in fact, rates are established all over the United States, and changes are only made in the case of complaint by a shipper or by a transportation company. A hearing is then held and the rate fixed as a result of the hearing; but the Interstate Commerce Commission only has to deal with a very limited number of corporations, and many of the cases coming before it are so similar in their characteristics that when the commission has once passed on a question it finds that similar reasoning and similar action will apply in the other cases. That can not be possible in the case of the trade board proposed in this bill.

There are more than 300,000 corporations which will come under the provisions of this bill. It is fair to say that every one of these corporations has some different method of conducting some particular part of its business, and therefore there may come before the commission in due time 300,000 different cases which will have to be heard and determined before the participants will know whether they are complying with the law. It is unnecessary to say that it would take a hundred years before any such result could be obtained, and, in the meantime, as I have suggested, there would be all the uncertainty and expense which would come from the attempts of business men to obey the law as they would wish to do.

Let me call to your attention some phases of the Sherman Antitrust Act showing its uncertainty and the varied opinions held by those who have been familiar with its operations as to its value. Primarily the Sherman Antitrust Act was intended to prevent monopoly and the making of contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade; in fact, it extended the common law to interstate and international commerce. As a National Government, as I understand, we have no common law; our national laws consist of the Constitution and the statutes made under its provisions; but the several States have adopted the English common law either by express provision or by usage.

Undoubtedly in passing the Sherman antitrust law it was not the purpose of Congress to prohibit contracts in restraint of trade which were deemed reasonable and not contrary to public policy. We have evidence to substantiate this statement, because there is now living the former distinguished Senator from Vermont, George F. Edmunds, who was at the time of the passage of that law chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and who has recently expressed himself in an interview on the trust bills which are pending as decidedly opposed to the passage of any of them. He said, in speaking of the trade commission bill, that it will merely upset things; that the present plan proposes to transfer the power of the Secretary of Commerce—meaning, I presume, the Commissioner of Corporations, who is under the Secretary of Commerce—to a commission and extending its powers. Mr. Edmunds used this language:

> As framed, the interstate trade commission bill—if it were valid—would give a tremendous power of tyranny which could easily employ itself in greed and corruption. It would concentrate power really in the President, who would have the power to appoint and remove the commissioners, and to control the whole business, inasmuch as by the apparently settled practice of the Government the President is authorized to keep his appointees in office without the consent of the Senate. If the Senate refuses to affirm a nominee, the President, if he chooses, appoints the rejected nominee over again, and so may keep on indefinitely, as has frequently happened in late years. The proposed commission would prove meddlesome, adding nothing to the merit possessed by the older Bureau of Corporations.

One of the leading members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate at that time was Senator Hoar. In fact, it is probable that the former Senator from Vermont, whom I have just quoted, and Senator Hoar, whom I am about to quote, had quite as much to do with the framing of the bill as any other men, although it bore the name of Senator Sherman. Senator Hoar gave testimony immediately after the passage of the act as to his understanding of its meaning. This was done in an opinion to the participants in what was known as the Wire Pool. Under their method of conducting business each manufacturer selling and delivering his product in another State or in a foreign country agreed to a condition which stipulated that his product should not be sold for less than an agreed scale of prices, and that each should pay into the common stock, to be divided into an agreed proportion, all profits by him received beyond what came from a specified amount of sales. Senator Hoar said that the plan under which they were operating was not, under the terms of the Sherman Antitrust Act, illegal, and that they were entirely within the provisions of the law if they continued to act in the manner which they were then following, his reasoning being that there was nothing in the agreement which created a monopoly; that, on the contrary, if enforced, it gave an advantage to corporations which did not enter into it and which could sell their product at a lower price. He illustrated his opinion in many ways to show why it did not conflict with the restraint-of-trade provision of the Sherman Antitrust Act, concluding that that act only intended to prohibit such contracts as might be found unreasonable and contrary to public policy under the common law. The wire pool continued its operations for many years; but during the last administration its members were proceeded against for violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. They plead guilty by advice of their attorneys and were fined from one thousand to five thousand dollars each. There was no evidence that they had in any way changed their methods, and there is every evidence that they were doing nothing which the framers of the law, as indicated in the opinion of Senator Hoar, considered illegal.

This statement introduces a very important feature of not only the Sherman Antitrust Act itself, but the bill which we are now considering, and that is its uncertainty. Until the Supreme Court handed down the decision in the Trans-Missouri case undoubtedly the court decisions indicated that the opinion of Senator Hoar in the case of the wire pool was justified; but the Supreme Court in the Trans-Missouri case made an entire change in the construction of the law, and therefore large corporations, learning that they could not pool their output, fix prices at which the output should be sold, and limit the output of the plants, took the only other course open to them in order to control not only prices but output by forming consolidations. These consolidations include most of the so-called trusts of the present day. Is it therefore unreasonable to conclude that the Sherman Antitrust Act and the construction placed on it by the Supreme Court in 1897 is largely responsible for what many people at the present time consider one of the great evils in our industrial situation?

Let me go somewhat further with an analysis of the Sherman Act for the purpose of developing the possibilities that may come from the pending legislation. We all know that it seems very simple to put on the statute books something which will seem to correct what somebody has charged as a proper subject for legislation, and yet we see after all these years how many diverse opinions of the Sherman Antitrust Act there are and how many highly respected men there are who have at all times borne good reputations in their homes who have been indicted under the criminal clauses of this act and fined for doing what most careful attorneys had instructed them could be done with safety and propriety.

We have had an example on this floor in the last few days of the varying conclusions which men reach as to the value of the present antitrust statute. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] believes that the law has been so construed by the courts that there is comparatively a clear course for business men to follow, and that the law is beneficial to all business interests, while we have heard the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] to-day express the opinion that the great results accomplished under the Sherman Antitrust Act, such as the severing into its constituent parts of the Tobacco Trust and the Standard Oil Trust, have not in any sense been beneficial to anyone; that they have not reduced or modified prices; that they have not changed the methods of operation of those companies which are continuing the same practice to-day. I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who can point out how, in any way, anybody has been benefited by the result of the litigation in those two cases.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator from Massachusetts seriously believe that there is anybody in the United States who thinks that the American Tobacco Trust was in fact dissolved by the decree which was entered by the circuit court of appeals and agreed to by the Attorney General?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, I do not know whether there are such persons or not. The Tobacco Trust was found guilty under the Sherman Antitrust Act, and the court prescribed what should be done. I do not know whether any more could be accomplished. I do not intend to criticize the court, because it would be extremely unfortunate for one not versed in the law to think of doing so; and I do not intend to criticize the law itself in its application in this case, but I do say that we are not getting results which are benefiting anybody from the construction that is placed upon it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. It does seem to me that in any practical mind, where there are common stock holdings in 14 different companies—it is true, with not the same personnel on each board of directors of the 14 companies—it is impossible to expect that there shall be genuine competition. They are not going to compete so as to hurt one another when they have these common holdings; and that was the vice of that alleged dissolution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if it does not interrupt the trend of the Senator's discussion, I think it is appropriate to call his attention to one of two proposed amendments to the pending bill which were offered just before we recessed yesterday by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], having charge of the bill.

The first is a proposed addition to section 5, which I will read:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

I am not wholly in accord with the trend of the Senator's discussion, but I fully sympathize with that part of it which is directed to the somewhat uncertain character of the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act as they have been applied to existing cases. I understand from the Senator having charge of the bill that the purpose of section 5 of the pending measure is to supplement the antitrust act by providing against and prohibiting unfair methods of competition. These methods are to be passed upon and determined by a commission which the bill creates, and the courts are afterwards to determine, if the exigency arises, upon the validity of the orders.

It may be that in the given instance the John Smith corporation, accused of practicing unfair methods of competition, will be haled before this commission, and the commission will decide, after the hearing that is given to both sides—I suppose both sides will have a hearing—that the practice is fair in some respects and unfair in others. There will be a court review of that decision and it will be affirmed, but perhaps the next week or the next year an indictment may be brought against that corporation or its members, or some of them, for a violation of the antitrust act, which violation is the result of its compliance with this order; and yet this amendment proposes that instead of protecting the defendant through the processes of the commission and the courts and shielding him from the consequences of his improper conduct, if he is proceeded against under the antitrust act he is not even permitted to defend himself by introducing either the order or the judgment in his defense.

It seems to me—of course I may not understand it, but it seems to me—that this is the most amazing proposition that ever was seriously introduced as an amendment to a bill. We are going to provide a system, a method for the intelligent transaction of business conducted without unfair methods of competition, but at the same time we are going to provide that if a proceeding is instituted against a person so doing, charged with the violation of some other statute, the thing which is done here, instead of being a protection, is going to be no defense at all. In other words, we are going to compel business men to come before this commission, tell them what they can do, and then, if under some other law they are to be punished, they can not seek protection or obtain any sort of consideration by virtue of their compliance with the statute we propose to enact.

I refer to this matter for the purpose of asking the Senator whether he has given consideration to the effect of this proposed amendment in connection with the criticism which he has made and will continue to make of the antitrust act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WEEKS. Let me reply first to the question which has just been asked me. I had not had called to my attention until a short time ago the amendment which the Senator from Colorado has just read. To my lay mind it seems that it would add to the confusion which this legislation would create. I may not understand it, and I do not want to say that finally until I have had it explained to me by those who have drawn it, and then I may want to modify my expression of opinion. I should think the business man would consider that he had troubles ahead, both "coming and going."

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that in my opinion there is no intention on the part of anybody to offer any protection to the business man by the passage of this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I disagree with the Senator in that. I think the purpose of this bill is good. I think the object sought to be subserved by the enactment of this sort of legislation is good; but I must protest, unless I have misconstrued it, against the attempt to secure legislation of a beneficial character by something which, if beneficial, will rob it of all of its efficacy at the very time and crisis when it is most needed for the protection of those for whose benefit it is proposed to be enacted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What the intentions may be which are benevolent I will not attempt to enumerate, but there is said to be a large country which is paved with that sort of furniture.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the road to that country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And there is a road to it which is broad and frequently traveled. [Laughter.] I think this commission will provide such a highway for those whose inclination is in that direction.

Mr. THOMAS. That is already provided.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Human nature may have provided it; and this may accelerate them for the decensus.

What I want to say to the Senator from Colorado is this: If I understand anything about the purposes of this bill—and I have had something to do with the attempt to resist the concoction of it—it does not propose to help the gentleman who is brought on here to have the commission decide whether or not his methods furnish an instance of unfair competition. It proposes to forbid him to continue to do what is complained of, if it does anything. If it finds that he has not been doing anything wrong, nobody intends that the finding of the commission shall be any protection to him. Nobody has ever pretended, either in debate or in committee hearing, that if the commission finds the man to be innocent he shall have any protection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield. It is an interesting colloquy, and I do not wish to cut it off.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall not prolong it. If the commission considers any controversy or any complaint brought before it, it is bound to make a decision. I assume that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will read the bill, he will see that if they find that the method of competition is unfair they are to report it to the Attorney General.

Mr. THOMAS. But whether the decision is that the competition is fair or that it is unfair, it is a decision. Whether the decision is negative or positive, it is a decision. It is a decision as to that particular subject matter; and to that extent it is, or ought to be, a protection or a warning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so.

Mr. THOMAS. Why, it must be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It must be, unless the bill provides otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS. But if this amendment comes along and declares that it shall not be admissible in any other proceeding, it practically robs it of all of its efficacy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I was complaining about the other day. I am glad the Senator sees that point. I see it perfectly clear, I think.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as I am in sympathy with the amendment that has just challenged the attention of the Senator from Colorado and the criticism of the Senator from Connecticut, I feel that it is due to say at this point that the Senator from Connecticut, at least, is in some confusion, and I do not wonder at the state of his mind. He is opposed to all such legislation, I assume. I do not believe the Senator from Colorado looks at the legislation from quite the same standpoint; and while I can not hope to convince the Senator from Connecticut—I have tried in vain to do that through weary days of conference in the committee—it may be that I can say something that will clear up the doubt which may exist in the mind of the Senator from Colorado.

In the first place, let it be remembered that it is the order of the commission which is not admissible in evidence in a suit under the antitrust law.

Mr. THOMAS. The language is "no order or finding of the court."

Mr. CUMMINS. And the finding of the court. The commission makes no order, and the court makes no order enforcing the judgment of the commission, unless it finds that there is unfair competition. If "unfair competition" were identical with "restraint of trade or commerce," the criticism of the Senator from Colorado would be unanswerable; but here are two radically different offenses. It is not supplemental to the antitrust law in so far as section 5 is concerned. It is intended to accomplish the same great object, but it is not supplemental to it in the sense that it is another attempt to enforce the antitrust law.

The antitrust law denounces restraint of trade or commerce and denounces monopoly. These are the offenses under that statute. Section 5 of this bill denounces unfair competition. In a trial as to the existence of unfair competition the issue is not the same as in a trial upon the issue of restraint of trade or commerce. There may be unfair competition in a restraint of trade, and there may be proof of unfair competition in a suit brought to establish restraint of trade; but the mere fact that there has been or exists unfair competition does not establish restraint of trade or commerce. Therefore, as it seems to me, the prosecutions under the two statutes ought to be entirely separate and distinct.

I think that is the reason for this amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Assuming the statement of the Senator from Iowa to be correct—and it certainly is very clear—I should like to ask him what office this proviso can perform. What is the use of it? Why encumber the bill with it?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is none, except to allay an unfounded criticism of the bill. It is already charged here that the purpose of this bill is to destroy the effectiveness and prevent the enforcement of the antitrust law. Inasmuch as it was the purpose of the author of the bill, and I am sure the purpose also of those members of the committee who favored the bill, that the antitrust law, presenting an entirely different issue, should remain untouched, unimpaired, and unembarrassed in its enforcement, therefore this amendment is proposed, just as many, many provisos are added to legislation that are not, from the strictly legal standpoint, necessary to accomplish the purpose.

I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado that inasmuch as the issues are different, and the inquiry therefore occupies a different field, the order would not be admissible anyhow; but I think it was the purpose of the committee to assure the people of the United States that in creating the additional offense against trade—namely, unfair competition in and of itself—we were not in any way interfering with the enforcement of the statute of 1890.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was about to submit——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say a word on this subject?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The amendment which I have offered as a proviso to section 5 has been under criticism. That amendment, taken in connection with another amendment adding a new section to the bill, absolutely prevents this measure from having any effect whatever upon the antitrust law or its enforcement. The reason why I offered this proviso and the additional section was that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] had offered an amendment which covered the ground of both, and I thought it more logical to divide it into these two parts.

I wish to say that individually I have always been in favor of taking away the administration of the Sherman antitrust law from the Attorney General's office and vesting it in a commission such as this is. If I had the power, I would do it to-day, because I believe it is the only way of securing the continuous, consecutive, consistent administration of the antitrust law. We all know how inconsistent that administration has been. One of the best illustrations is that a suit which was brought under the Attorney General in Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet to dissolve the New York, New Haven & Hartford combination was dismissed by an Attorney General in Mr. Taft's Cabinet, and the suit was renewed by an Attorney General in Mr. Wilson's Cabinet.

At the same time, whilst I have desired to accomplish this and desire it to-day, I realize that the public mind favors and sustains the continuance of the Sherman antitrust law, and as yet its attention has not been called to the inefficient administration of that law through the present system of intrusting it to the Attorney General's office. I realize also that an attempt to disassociate the Attorney General's office from the administration of the law itself would be regarded as an act inimical to the law itself. Public opinion has not yet reached the point where we can secure the safe, continuous, persistent, and consistent administration of the Sherman antitrust law through a commission.

We faced the fact then that we could not give this commission jurisdiction and control over the administration of the antitrust law, but we could make it efficient in aid of the court and of the Attorney General. We have done that, and we have concluded to go further and to reach practices which, whilst perhaps they might be incidentally reached through the administration of the Sherman antitrust law, could not always be reached. These practices constitute the very germ of monopolies. They are the monopolies in embryo. In order to pass this bill it was necessary to give absolute assurance that the antitrust law itself would not be interfered with, and it was with that view that I assented to this amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that when he says I am against all such legislation as this, he is absolutely accurate. Any such legislation as this he will find me against, now and forever; and I think any sane man ought to be. I will say that to him.

As to what the Senator from Colorado says, that this commission has to make a finding one way or the other, fair or unfair, and give the man who is dragged down here under a charge of carrying on an unfair method of competition either a conviction or an acquittal, I will say to him that the bill does not provide any such thing at all.

Mr. THOMAS. There must be some action on the part of the commission, negative or positive.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me read the bill to the Senator, and I will tell him what the action of the commission must be, if it acts at all.

Mr. THOMAS. But, inherently, if a complaint is filed with the commission it must either dismiss it or sustain it, regardless of the language of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will read the bill, and then the Senator can decide whether inherently it must or not. I am reading what it does. What it ought to do I have no concern with, because I know it never will do what it ought to do.

Section 5 provides:

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe—that any corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition in commerce, it shall issue and serve upon such corporation a written order, at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing it to appear before the commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by the commission restraining and prohibiting it from using such method of competition, and if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act it shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same.

Whatever that may mean—

That is all there is to it. There is not a word in the bill to the effect that if they shall find that the method is not unfair they shall say so, and give the accused the benefit of a finding that he has done no wrong. The bill provides that anybody can smirch the reputation of the most respectable business man in this country by filing a charge that he is breaking the law by indulging in an unfair method of competition and drag him down here to defend himself; and when he successfully defends himself, and proves the man who brought the charge against him was a liar, or was laboring under a misconception of the law—which he probably will be, because there is no information in the bill to enlighten him as to what unfair methods are—the commission simply says, "Well, we can not find you guilty; we find nothing to prohibit what you are doing," and he wanders back home again. He is practically arrested, and yet not even a discharge is given him. No finding whatever is made. The commission throws up its hands and says, "On the evidence presented we do not find that this is an unfair method." They may say it to him, but they do not find it.

Mr. THOMAS. Is not that a finding?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; they may say so. They do not find it. The act provides that if they find it is unfair they shall issue an order.

Mr. THOMAS. And if they find it is not unfair, then is it the contention of the Senator that the commission is powerless to say anything?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My contention is that the bill stops there.

Mr. THOMAS. And that the case must remain perpetually before them?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My contention is that the bill is so deficient that it does not provide what the event of the suit is.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is deficient in some respects, but I do not think it is so deficient as that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I do. I think there is only one verdict provided here which the commission may give. It is not even authorized to find that the method is fair; and here is an amendment providing that even the unfair orders or findings of the commission shall not be offered in evidence anywhere else.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one statement made by the Senator from Connecticut that I do not want to go unnoticed, although he did not intend to misstate it, of course. I do not want Senators to believe that this is an adversary proceeding, instituted by a third person before the commission. There is no right given here for a person to file a complaint against another before the commission. The commission initiates the inquiry under the language "if it has reason to believe that a violation of the law has occurred." Then the investigation goes forward.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not said that it provided for any petition to be filed, Mr. President. I called attention to the fact that the language of the bill is:

> Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe—

Whatever that may mean——

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator said that anyone could haul a reluctant and innocent business man down before the commission, and that he had no remedy except to wander back home.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not. I say anybody can make a complaint, and he can go to the commission or write them a letter or see them personally; and if he can satisfy them or arouse their suspicion to the point that the commission think they "have reason to believe," then the commission issue their process.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I feel that I am to be congratulated that such an interesting colloquy has been injected into an otherwise dull discussion. I am to discuss some of the matters which have been referred to by Senators, and especially the question which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] discussed, relating to the consistent operation of the Department of Justice.

I am quite in sympathy with him that some change should be made in that respect, and I think in other matters relating to the Sherman Antitrust Act. I have positive opinions about that, and I want, preliminary to expressing those opinions, to give some references to the working of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the opinions which others have had of the result of those workings.

President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress in the winter of 1907–8, speaking of the Sherman Act, said:

> It should be so amended as to forbid only the kind of combination which does harm to the general public, such amendment to be an incident of a grant of supervisory power to the Government over these big concerns engaged in interstate business.

And in a special message to Congress on March 25, 1908, he said, again:

> This antitrust act was a most unwisely drawn statute. It is mischievous and unwholesome to keep upon the statute book, unmodified, a law like the antitrust law, which, while in practice only partially effective against vicious combinations, has nevertheless in theory been construed so sweepingly to prohibit every combination for the transaction of modern business.

Judge Knapp, who at one time was chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and is now judge of the United States Circuit Court, referred to the workings of the Sherman Antitrust Act in this language:

> I believe the most mischievous piece of legislation in the history of the country is the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. It is intolerable and strikes a blow at development and progress.

Mr. Seth Low, at a hearing before the House Judiciary Committee, referred to the act as follows. Mr. Low was at that time the president of the National Civic Federation. He said:

> Common carriers, business corporations and business men, labor organizations and labor men, have all had it brought home to them, one after another, that under the terms of the Sherman antitrust law a large part of the business done in the United States at the present time is being done contrary to law. * * *

I want to point that out more fully later. That is a correct statement.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator if those statements were made prior to the decisions in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases?

Mr. WEEKS. They were all made prior to that time. Mr. Low continued:

> As a further aggravation of the situation, the antitrust law is a penal one. * * * I respectfully submit that this is a situation which is literally intolerable. It inevitably leads to a wide disregard of the statute, upon the theory that "necessity knows no law," because business to be done at the present time must be done by modern methods, and these often involve some restraint of trade. * * * A better method for sapping enterprise could scarcely be devised.

In 1902 Senator Hoar, at that time chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked the Attorney General, Mr. Knox, if he could suggest any additional further legislation as applying to the Sherman Antitrust Act. Mr. Knox's reply is contained in Senate Document No. 73, in which he said:

> It is difficult to improve upon the great unwritten code known as the common law. Under its salutory guaranties and restraints the English-speaking people have attained their wealth and power. It condemns monopoly and contracts in restraint of trade as well. The distinction, however, between restraints that are reasonable, in view of all the circumstances, and those which are unreasonable is recognized and has been followed in this country by the courts.

This is added evidence to the suggestion which I have made that it might be found if there were no law regulating combinations or monopolies or competition, fair or unfair; that while there would undoubtedly be some abuses, a few of which would seem to be intolerable, that as a matter of fact business would adjust itself in most cases, growth would be limited by the possibilities of efficient management, and competition would be governed by pooling arrangements which would be recognized as they have been in the past by business men as absolutely essential to preserve stability in business.

That there was doubt in the wisdom of the decision in the Trans-Missouri case made in 1897 is evidenced by expressions in the minority opinion written by the present Chief Justice and concurred in by Mr. Justice Field, Mr. Justice Gray, and Mr. Justice Shiras relating to the "rule of reason," one expression of this being as follows:

> It is, I submit, not to be doubted that the interpretation of the words "every contract in restraint of trade" so as to embrace within its purview every contract, however reasonable, would certainly work an enormous injustice and operate to the undue restraint of the liberties of the citizen.

The question was raised in the minority opinion to which I have just referred whether the provisions of the act of 1890 were intended to apply to contracts between interstate carriers entered into for the purpose of securing fairness in their dealings with each other, and whether the statute of 1890 was intended to abrogate the power of railway companies to make contracts which had been expressly provided for in the act of 1887. The act of 1890 did not, like its predecessor, relate alone to interstate commerce in transportation matters, but is a general law applying to all forms of interstate commerce. It is not believed, and the minority opinion referred to in this decision corroborates that view, that the act of 1890 was intended to abrogate in any way the provisions of the act of 1887, and I very much doubt if Congress intended that public-service corporations should be included in the provisions of the Sherman Act of 1890. It is worthy of note that the "rule of reason" enunciated in the minority opinion in the Trans-Missouri decision was approved by the entire court with one exception, in rendering a decision in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, May 11, 1911.

In the Tobacco case and Standard Oil case the courts undoubtedly said you may now restrain such commerce, provided you are reasonable about it, only have a care that the restraint is not undue. This was the view taken by Mr. Justice Harlan in his dissenting opinion of the majority opinion of the court, and while the majority opinion suggests a rule of reason, it has not done enough to materially change conditions which have prevailed since 1897. To do so it should extend the doctrine of the rule of reason and permit trade combinations which are not unreasonably injurious to the public welfare and which impose no heavier restraints on trade than is required for the proper protection of the interests of the parties to a combination, and it should be noted that Attorney General Wickersham did not, in his public expressions, indicate that he believed, in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, which were found to be monopolies within the second section of the Sherman Antitrust Act, the court had construed the law to apply only to contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade, but that, on the other hand, every case must be decided on the facts as submitted in that case.

Speaking of the number of violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act, Attorney General Wickersham, in 1911, is quoted as saying that he had been over Moody's Manual of Corporations with a good deal of care, and found prima facie evidence of about 100 monopolistic combinations in addition to the number against which suits had been brought at that time. Suit was not brought during the last administration against many of these corporations, quite likely because there were so many cases pending that the department did not have opportunity to prepare them. Neither has suit been brought against many of these corporations since the advent of this administration; in only 14 instances has a new suit been brought to dissolve a corporation of this character. It would appear from this that the administration had abandoned its preelection declarations, and especially those of the President, to crush out monopolistic organizations whether they were in reasonable or unreasonable restraint of trade.

Only about one-half the 44 suits brought during Mr. Roosevelt's seven years prevailed, and in many of these cases the result of pleading guilty was a fine, it being demonstrated that the defendants supposed they were obeying the law.

As a matter of fact, the law has not been enforced in hundreds of cases in which it would undoubtedly be effective if the Department of Justice took action, and the Government is responsible to some degree that the present conditions obtain, because it has permitted by its silence a vast number of combinations and allowed them to continue in operation for many years without proceeding against them.

Some time ago the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] introduced a resolution calling on the Attorney General for information as to what action he was taking in the case of the New York Central consolidations, which the Senator believed were improperly made. I suggested at the time that if the Attorney General was to proceed in this case he should make his action general and proceed against other similar combinations. If a law is a bad one it should not be continued on the statute books, and the only way to demonstrate whether it is good or bad is to enforce it. As an evidence of the very general laxity in the enforcement of this law in the matter of consolidations, I want to submit to the Senate the number of railroad combinations which have taken place in the United States since the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. I presume it will surprise many to know how generally this spirit of consolidation has been going on, practically speaking, without a protest from the Department of Justice in hundreds of cases. I have here a complete list of the consolidations and absorptions which have been made during the last 24 years, which I wish printed in the RECORD, for while it is a very voluminous production, it will furnish information which I think may be of value to the Senate and to the country.

Without going into detail, it is sufficient for me to say that there have been 1,485 consolidations and absorptions of 104,611 miles of railroad, a very considerable part, as will be noticed, of the 250,000 miles of railroad in the United States.

I have here a statement prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, Division of Statistics, relating to this matter, which I wish included in the RECORD:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, DIVISION OF STATISTICS,
July 17, 1914.

Memorandum concerning the accompanying statement compiled from Annual Reports on the Statistics of Railways in the United States for the years ending June 30, 1891 to 1912, giving names of railway companies consolidated, merged, or purchased.

The details presented in this statement have been taken from tables in the commission's Annual Reports on the Statistics of Railways in the United States that, respectively, explained the omission of the names of any railway companies that were included in a related table of an immediately prior report, showing railway mileage in the United States at the end of the year.

The statement is, therefore, in certain respects, incomplete, because, with possibly a few exceptions, it does not contain, regarding companies the existence of which began and ceased within a fiscal year or regarding companies that owned no mileage or concerning which no returns were made, facts similar to those shown for the companies listed for which some information was published in the statistical reports as indicated above.

It should not be understood, however, that the inclusion of the names of railway companies in the accompanying list means, in all cases, that the companies have ceased to be corporate entities, but merely that they have been shown in reports as practically consolidated or merged so far as operation and accounting are concerned.

The portion of the statement pertaining to the years 1908 to 1912 does not cover switching and terminal companies.

W. J. MEYERS, Statistician.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume the Senator does not mean to have it inferred that this large number of combinations were in violation of the Sherman law.

Mr. WEEKS. I am going on to discuss that now.

I do not know what the courts would say in very many of these cases. They were undoubtedly, in some instances, continuations of lines; yet in hundreds of cases they are as competitive with some other part of the system into which they have been taken as is the Boston & Maine Railroad with the New York, New Haven & Hartford, one being practically a continuation of the other, and yet it is reported that the Government is about to proceed against the New Haven Railroad, to compel a dissolution of these two systems——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he does not think from the facts which he has adduced regarding the combination of railway lines involving, as I understood him to say, about 1,400 consolidations, demonstrate the absolute necessity of intrusting the enforcement of the antitrust law, so far as it relates to railroads, to the Interstate Commerce Commission instead of to the Attorney General's Office?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say in this connection that these combinations have been made during the past 20 years without any attempt on the part of the Attorney General's Office to interfere, and they have been effected in such a way that these systems, embracing in many cases two or three hundred lines, have become so interwoven through stock issues and bond issues and security issues of various kinds that it is almost impossible to disentangle them; and also the fact is clear that to attempt to disentangle them would be injurious to the public interest. Whilst technically possibly in some of these systems for a comparatively short length parallel lines may have been combined, I do not think that anyone will contend but that outside of the question of overcapitalization these gigantic combinations, which have practically reduced the systems of the country to about 15 in all, have been vastly beneficial to the transportation of the country.

I ask the Senator whether he does not think that the tribunal that has knowledge of transportation and knowledge of the administration of railroads should have the function of enforcing that law as against railroad companies instead of intrusting it simply to a law officer?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I do not understand exactly what the Senator means by some of the statements that he makes. Does he mean that many of these combinations have been contrary to law, but nevertheless they are so advantageous that it would have been wise to have allowed them to occur? Does he mean that the result as it stands to-day, although brought about, perhaps, in some cases or in many cases contrary to the strict letter of the law, is a benefit to the community?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think in very many instances it would have been a calamity to have prevented the junction of such lines as were involved in the Northern Securities case and two or three transcontinental lines. I do think that the general consolidations which have been effected, even though in some instances they have involved the consolidation of lines that have been parallel for a hundred or two hundred miles, have been vastly beneficial to the business of the country, and it would have been a misfortune to attempt to disentangle them.

For that reason, if that work is to be done, and the Attorney General's Office has started upon it with reference to the New York, New Haven & Hartford, I believe the decision should be intrusted to the Interstate Commerce Commission under a law that will permit them to determine whether these combinations, even though technical violations of the Sherman law, were not beneficial to the public interest.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, as I understand the Senator's idea and theory of the procedure of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it is that although many of these combinations were in violation of the law, nevertheless it was a benefit to the country that they were allowed to occur.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would not expect, of course, to allow them in violation of the law. It would be within the power of the recommendation which they possess to have presented to Congress legislation which would permit desirable combinations, even though, technically, they might involve a combination for short distances lines that in some degree were competitive.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then if all these railroads had been under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the last 20 years, one of two things would have had to happen, either the consolidations that the Senator thinks are of such great value to the country would not have been made or the Interstate Commerce Commission would have had to wink at violations of the law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Or else recommend legislation to Congress.

Mr. LIPPITT. Or else Congress would have had to pass laws in modification of the Sherman law?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Modifying it so far as the railroad companies are concerned, which, of course, are natural monopolies, and which are now recognized as such.

Mr. LIPPITT. So the Senator really thinks the Sherman law would have been a bad thing, as far as the railroad transportation of this country is concerned, if it had really been enforced?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If enforced with rigidity.

Mr. LIPPITT. What other way is there to enforce a law except to enforce it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know how the Interstate Commerce Commission would have enforced it. Doubtless it would have proceeded in accordance with the law.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will ask the Senator with reference to a statement which he made in his address in introducing the trade commission bill, in which he said that if at the time the Interstate Commerce Commission had been established there had also been established the trade commission the general business of this country would be in the same condition as the railroad business is to-day.

I was trying to find out exactly what he thought that situation would have been. Apparently from his description he believes in regard to these things that what would have happened under these conditions would have been that we would have had a trade commission that would have winked at violations of the law in some circumstances and would have enforced it strictly under other circumstances, and the result of it would have been that a very considerable number of combinations would have been brought about with the approval of the trade commission and in violation of law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island can not find in a word that I have uttered any justification for his remark that the trade commission would have winked at violations of the law. All I say is that these consolidations would have been effected, if effected at all, under the inspection of an expert body that had some knowledge of transportation and would not have been submitted to the uncontrolled will of the railroads themselves; that the consolidations effected would have been pursuant to law and not in violation of law; that if, in pursuance of law, they found that the law itself prevented in some cases desirable consolidations they would have presented their recommendations to Congress in such shape as to secure legislation modifying the existing law, and that simply in recognition of the fact that the railroads are quite distinct from trading corporations, and that the railroads themselves, in their very nature, so far as the territory which they cover is concerned, are practically monopolistic in character, and as such they are regarded as public utilities and regulated in their charges as trading corporations are not.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the statements of the Senator have brought out very clearly the very complicated relations with which we are going to be confronted when we undertake to deal with trade matters through a trade commission. If the Interstate Commerce Commission, in order to bring about desirable results in the country, would have had either to secure the enactment of new laws or prevent the beneficial things which the Senator has described or would have had to wink at violations of the law—if I may still use that expression—in what is such a simple thing relatively as the railroad business of the country, what would have happened to the enormous variety of business interests that would have been brought under such a commission is something almost indescribable. It was really for the purpose of emphasizing that situation a little that I asked the question.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to emphasize the point which the Senator from Nevada has made, that the Department of Justice has failed in prosecuting palpable violations of the law. Undoubtedly many of them have been in the public interest, and I think we shall all admit that under those circumstances the law should be so framed that there will be no requirement for a prosecution. That is one of the suggestions that I am going to make in regard to the Sherman antitrust law, that it has not been enforced as it should have been and it should be changed to conform to what is for the public interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit an interruption at this point——

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call attention to a statement made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] which he has repeated at least twice during the discussion of this bill, and which I think he is justified in making from the history of the past. In substance it is that the Attorney General, being a political officer, part of an administration connected closely with the politics and the political conditions of the country, often does not enforce the law for reasons that would not move a body such as, according to his theory, the trade commission will be, namely, a permanent, nonpartisan organization, and one that will not vary with changing conditions in politics.

I think there is a great deal in the suggestion that the Senator has made. His theory is that the proposed trade commission will not be influenced by considerations of that kind, because it will be beyond political parties or the changing of administrations from one party to another, and for that reason may do things that the Attorney General for political reasons can not do.

I can not let the occasion pass without calling attention to the fact that, assuming that to be true—and at least to a great extent, I think, it will be conceded that it is true—it is a sad commentary, it seems to me, upon the politics of the country, and is another illustration that partisanship interferes not only with the making of laws, but with their administration. If because of partisan reasons an Attorney General winks, under instructions, perhaps, from party associates, at a violation of the law, it seems to me that it is a serious criticism of our political parties; and although this bill may afford a remedy to a certain extent, as the Senator from Nevada believes it will, I think that the same criticism can be applied to almost every other department of the Government, that it is influenced by political considerations and exigencies of a campaign that may be approaching.

I thought when the Senator previously called attention to that subject that the Senate and the country ought to be made aware of the fact that, even though this bill may provide a remedy for that kind of evil along certain lines, it will not provide a remedy for the evil of partisanship along other lines, and for the conditions that control the administration of the various political parties in preparing for a campaign that may be approaching.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska what warrant he has for assuming that the proposed trade commission will be a nonpartisan body? We have had experience here in reference to the Federal Reserve Board. We all had a right to suppose that a board of that kind, constituted to manage the financial affairs of this country, would be a nonpartisan board; but what transpired? Lo and behold, every one of the five names sent in here for membership of that board was that of a Democrat who had voted the Democratic ticket. There was not a single Republican among them.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to answer?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am told that one of them never voted.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes; he is a voter; but he only voted once, and that was for Wilson.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought he never voted at all.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; he made an exception in that case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. NELSON. What right has the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Nevada to assume that this new commission will be a nonpartisan commission?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to answer the question which the Senator from Minnesota has propounded to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not assuming that it will be a nonpartisan commission; I was making a statement deduced from what the Senator from Nevada had said, and I perhaps would have been a little more accurate if I had said that the idea of the Senator from Nevada was—and I think that is right—that it would be a permanent commission, one that would not be dependent upon the success of any political party or any administration to continue it in power, and therefore would feel like enforcing the law without reference to what effect it might have on politics. I am not saying that that is true; I am not offering any suggestions in defense of this bill; I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the statement made by the Senator from Nevada, founded, as I believe, upon a proper statement of the conditions that have existed in the past which make it necessary for Congress to protect the country from the evils of our partisan administration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In reply to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I have to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission always has been a bipartisan board. That is one of its chief virtues. A majority only of that commission can belong to one political party. It is provided in the trade commission bill that a majority only can belong to one political party. Unfortunately, when the Federal Reserve Board was created such a provision was not put into the law. In my judgment it ought to have been put into the law, and the correction should be made as early as possible.

I can understand very easily how that board can drift into partisan administration if it is composed entirely of the members of one party.

Mr. NELSON. That shows how necessary it is to bridle the President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it is always incumbent upon the lawmakers to put the proper cautionary phrases into the law. We had the opportunity and we lost it. We should avail ourselves of the opportunity at as early a date as possible. We all know that it was the identification of the old United States Bank with an existing administration that brought that whole system into discredit.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I wish to say that the reserve system will also fall into discredit if it comes under partisan administration and is not neutralized by some such system as that which prevails with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator from Nevada think that a provision should be incorporated in this bill requiring the members of the trade commission to undergo an examination as to their moral qualifications, as to their notions of what is right and just as affecting trusts and monopolies? Should there not be a qualification of that sort, or would the Senator have men on the commission entertaining the ideas of Mr. Jones, who are entirely neutral until the Supreme Court has passed upon such questions?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would listen with great consideration to any suggestion which the Senator from Minnesota might make along that line.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. President, the suggestion which has been made here about carrying out the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law is a matter which I am going to discuss later; but no law should be put on the statute books for which there is not a strong public sentiment. That is one of the criticisms I make of the legislation which is now pending. I do not believe there is any real public sentiment among the people who know anything about it anywhere in the United States in favor of this legislation. I do not believe the people generally understand it, nor do I believe the business men understand it. That is one of the criticisms I make of this legislation; but I do not think that partisanship has had so much to do with the failure to carry out the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, so far as dissolving combinations is concerned, as has the fact that there has been no public sentiment in favor of such procedure Many, if not a large majority, of the combinations formed have been in the public interest, so to dissolve them would be directly against the public interest. That, in my opinion, is the reason that the law officers of the Government have not moved.

If it is desirable, however, to dissolve the Boston & Maine and New Haven systems, or if a bill to bring about that dissolution would prevail, which I very much doubt, because they are in a sense connecting rather than competitive systems——

Mr. LIPPITT. Supplemental.

Mr. WEEKS. Supplemental, yes; if that prevails, then practically every railroad system in the country may be dismembered by separating it into its original constituent parts, a process which would be expensive and burdensome on stockholders and the public, for the service which could be performed by those dismembered units would be incomparably poorer than that performed by the companies as they stand to-day.

Certainly we have gone beyond the question of competition in railroad management in this country. Now, railroads are substantially operated under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which fixes rates and determines the manner of operation in contested cases. Therefore, having given up competition and having established what railroad corporations are in effect without competition—that is, natural monopolies—we should certainly take them from under the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act and permit consolidations whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission decides, as the result of investigation, that the public interest will be served as a result of the consolidation.

I know how difficult it would be to get a Congress to take this action, and yet I believe it is infinitely more important to follow such a course than it is to pass the legislation which we are now considering; and if we are going to pass this bill, in my judgment the whole Sherman Antitrust Act should be repealed.

Take the case of the Boston & Maine and New Haven Railroads, suit for the dissolution of which has been brought. If those two roads are in competition—as has been suggested by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], one is supplemental to the other—there are 45 other roads which go to make up those two systems, which have been consolidated since 1890 with one or the other of those systems, which are in competition with some part of either the New Haven or the Boston & Maine Railroad Co. For instance, the Eastern Railroad of New Hampshire, which runs from Newburyport, in Massachusetts, to Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, is directly parallel to the main line of the Boston & Maine Railroad. Take the Portland, Saco & Portsmouth Railroad, which runs from Portsmouth, N. H., to Portland, Me., that is also directly parallel not only to the Boston & Maine Railroad but to the Worcester, Nashua & Rochester Railroad, which has also been consolidated with the Boston & Maine within that time. The Portland & Rochester is a part of the Worcester, Nashua & Rochester Railroad, which is parallel not only to the Portsmouth, Saco & Portland, but is parallel to the main line of the Boston & Maine Railroad. At many points they run within 5 or 6 miles of one another.

To go on through the whole list is unnecessary. Take one or two cases connected with the New Haven system, the New England Railroad, for instance, which was merged with the New Haven in 1908. The New England Railroad is directly parallel to the shore-line road from New Haven, Conn., to Boston, Mass. If there is any such thing as dissolution on account of competition——

Mr. LIPPITT. I wish to ask the Senator a question, so as to understand exactly what he means by that. He said that the New England road was parallel to the New Haven from New Haven to Boston.

Mr. WEEKS. From New Haven, Conn., to Boston, Mass.

Mr. LIPPITT. While it is parallel, it is parallel in most cases at a very considerable distance from the New Haven, the shore-line road. So far as the traffic between New Haven and Boston is concerned, it is parallel; in its intermediate aspects it serves an entirely different community.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true. In the intermediate points between Boston and New Haven they serve entirely different communities.

Mr. LIPPITT. So that it is competitive so far as through traffic is concerned, but so far as the other traffic is concerned it is not competitive.

Mr. WEEKS. I am much obliged to the Senator for making that point, because it is quite correct; but if there is any such thing as a dissolution of competitive lines, then this dissolution has got to go to the units from which these lines have been built up, and that would be directly against the public interest. That is the reason why the Department of Justice has not proceeded in all these cases, in my opinion; and I think it has acted wisely in not doing so, although I believe in enforcing the law and by its enforcement showing how absurd or bad it is, and that will bring about a repeal of such legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if it is his idea that in accomplishing the dissolution it will be necessary to disassociate those lines that are mere extensions, and not competitors?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I do not think it should be done.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the Senator's opinion that the court must do so?

Mr. WEEKS. That is a question upon which I should rather have the opinion of the Senator from Montana than my own.

Mr. WALSH. I have an idea about it; but I gathered from the Senator that he felt that the organization would be broken up into its units, regardless of whether they were competitive or otherwise.

Mr. WEEKS. I will answer the Senator. I think that, as far as the monopoly section of the Sherman Antitrust Act is concerned, a continuation might go to make up a part of a monopoly, in which case it should be dissevered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Massachusetts has more than once said that the test ought to be whether a particular combination or arrangement is injurious to the public interest. To whom would the Senator delegate the power of determining whether a particular arrangement or combination is injurious to the public interest?

Mr. WEEKS. I would delegate it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as public-service corporations are concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. And what effect would the Senator give to the decision of such a commission?

Mr. WEEKS. I would leave it under the same provisions that obtain in that law in all respects. If it would mean confiscation as a result, then I think the participants should have the right to appeal to the courts. Otherwise, I think the findings should be final.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suppose there is not much difference of opinion in this country now upon the legal proposition that we can not delegate to any authority, judicial or administrative, the power to determine what is for the public interest or what is injurious to the public interest. That, however, leads me to ask this question:

The Supreme Court has now decided that a restraint of trade or commerce, in order to be a violation of the act, must be an undue or unreasonable restraint of trade. In my opinion, that means exactly the same thing as a restraint of trade injurious to the public interest. Those who have had the time and the inclination to look into the common law on this subject will remember that the courts of England had very often used that phrase, not, as I think, with regard to restraint of trade, but with regard to restraint of competition; and the test which those courts employed was this: "Is this particular restraint of competition or interference with competition such as to affect injuriously the public interest?" If the answer to that question was in the affirmative, then the restraint of competition constituted a restraint of trade; otherwise not.

We did not follow that exact line in our statute, but I believe that with the present construction of the antitrust law the Supreme Court has assumed the power to decide whether a particular restraint of trade is or is not injurious to the public interest.

Mr. WEEKS. I have tried to point out that I believed that was the intention of the framers of the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. If that be so, we have reposed in the courts of this country the authority to determine whether a particular practice, combination, or arrangement was or was not harmful to the public welfare; and if we have done that, I take it the Senator from Massachusetts would have no hesitation in reposing similar authority in a commission.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, my idea would be that any such authority should be very definite, and not general; that the law should be as definite as possible. That is one reason why I have suggested that, in my judgment, the Sherman Antitrust Act should be amended, and the provisions which apply to the consolidation of public-service corporations should be repealed. I have not any doubt in my mind about the desirability of having that done; and to go on giving to anyone authority to act without having definite limitations in the law is, in my judgment, going too far.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. It is of just that of which I complain. It is of that I complain with reference to the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Tobacco case and in the Standard Oil case. It is assuming an authority which the legislature can not confer, and which I believe has been usurped at this time by the judicial branch of the Government.

We can not make anything definite so long as we attach to it the provision "if it be in the public interest," or "if it be not opposed to the public welfare." That phrase at once destroys all certainty, all definiteness, and leaves the tribunal, whatever it may be—whether a court or whether a commission—to make laws for the people rather than to administer them. That is the very trouble in any effort to make the antitrust law more specific than it now is.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa was honoring me with his attention when I commenced my discussion of this question, and he will recall that I criticized at once the uncertainties that had developed as a result of the construction of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and the uncertainties which would be added to, in my judgment, by putting this legislation on the statute books; that I believed the whole subject of the connection which this Government has with corporations should be carefully and thoroughly considered; we should find out what other people are doing, whether what they have done has been advantageous or not, and a report should be made which would cover all the facts obtainable in such an inquiry. Then we would have a basis for legislation. Now, in my judgment, we have not either a public sentiment in favor of the legislation or a sound basis on which to frame the legislation; and we are going to have added confusion and trouble in business instead of giving freedom to business, which phrase has been repeated so vociferously by so many.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is much force in the Senator's suggestion, Mr. President, but in one respect he is in error. We have examined what other countries have done. The laws of Germany are in this record. The laws of England are in this record. The laws of Australia are in this record. The laws of New Zealand, I suppose the most advanced community in the world, are in the record. The investigation has taken the widest possible range. The only question that remains is, Are we sufficiently strong of mind to draw from these illustrations the proper lesson and compose the proper legislation?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am well aware that what the Senator says about the record is quite correct; but we are not doing what any other country has done. No other country has a law like the Sherman Antitrust Act on its statute books, and if it had I believe it would not think of adding legislation of this character. One, in a sense, is the antithesis of the other. You are going to have difficulty in finding out where one commences and the other leaves off. The confusion in the minds of those who have been devoting their time to this question, the doubt which has been expressed on this floor as to what the different phases of this question will mean or how they will be construed, indicates the confusion into which business will be thrown by putting such legislation on the statute books.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What particular phrase in the proposed legislation does the Senator allude to as being confusing?

Mr. WEEKS. Why, "unfair competition."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I supposed the Senator alluded to.

Mr. WEEKS. Every business man will have a lawyer at his elbow to tell him what he can do, and then the courts will tell him that what his attorney has told him to do he can not do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the bill states that "unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful," the Senator from Massachusetts does not think that furnishes any light to anybody about what he may or may not do?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we have a difference of opinion about that. I believe "unfair competition" is much more clearly understood by business men than "restraint of trade." We were speaking of Australia a few moments ago. Australia has a statute which expressly declares that unfair competition is unlawful, and it is enforcing it.

Mr. WEEKS. I remember the statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say that Australia also has a statute which is much more stringent than the antitrust law, although it confers a great deal more power upon the administering body—that is, the court or the council—namely, it has a positive prohibition against all these things if they be detrimental to the public interest. I do not remember the exact language, but the substance of it is, if they be detrimental to the public interest.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will permit me, the language is, "to the detriment of the public." I was looking at that to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad the Senator from South Dakota recalls the exact language. Now, if there could be anything more uncertain than that language, it is impossible for me to conceive it. When we ask a judge or a member of a council to say whether a particular act or series of acts is detrimental to the public interest we have to repose that power in somebody, or the equivalent of that power.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, that introduces the question whether we are a more progressive and advanced country than Australia. Are our industries gaining more slowly than those of Australia; are our people, compared with those of Australia, in an inferior position; or are we in a better condition, when we compare everything that goes to make up life, than the people of Australia? If we are not advancing as rapidly as they; if we are not gaining in population, if we are not developing to the best interest of our people as rapidly as Australia, then we had better adopt their system; but if we are gaining more rapidly than they, why should we give up something we have and adopt what they are doing?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. In connection with the observation of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], if I am not in error, the statute of Australia referred to by the three Senators was considered by privy council in the House of Lords of England from July 3 to July 25, 1913; and under the construction by the highest court of England it was there held that the words "unfair competition" or "to the detriment of the public interest" must be construed to mean the same as "unlawful or undue restraint of trade," in so far as the public interest was concerned, as used by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Tobacco case.

Therefore I beg to call the attention of the able Senator to the fact that "unfair competition," the exact phraseology of the statute of Australia, received a construction, not from Australia, not from the lower tribunal to which he alludes, but from the highest court of the English-speaking world next to our own, where a construction is given to it as having the meaning contended for by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. COLT. I happen to have the laws of Australia before me. Section 6, paragraph 1, says:

> For the purposes of section 4 and section 10 of this act, unfair competition means competition which is unfair in the circumstances—

Then follows this significant part:

> And in the following cases competition shall be deemed to be unfair unless the contrary is proved:
> (a) If the defendant is a commercial trust.
> (b) If the competition would probably or does in fact result in an inadequate remuneration for labor in the Australian industry.

I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if that is the sense in which "unfair competition" is used in the trade commission bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. It requires the direct declaration of the legislature to make it so.

Mr. COLT (reading):

> (c) If the competition would probably, or does, in fact, result in inadequate remuneration to labor in the Australian industry or throwing workers out of employment—

And so forth.

So the Australian law first defines unfair competition as that which would be unfair under the circumstances, and then it goes on to enumerate the particular instances in which such competition is unfair. The difficulty that lies in my mind is that when you introduce the words "unfair competition" in this proposed law you are embarked on a sea of uncertainty and of doubt.

Restraints of trade and attempts at monopoly are founded upon the common law of three or four centuries. Their meaning is known and defined. One element which enters into these transactions is that they are detrimental to the public. A contract in restraint of trade at common law was detrimental to the individual and detrimental to the public.

A monopoly was also held to be detrimental to the public, because it restrained the liberty of the people in respect to trade. The Supreme Court in their decisions have reached a solid foundation when they came to interpret restraint of trade and attempts at monopoly by the great law of reason, which is simply the rule of common sense based upon a sense of justice and the ethical standard of the people. Thus the Supreme Court have a safe criterion by which to interpret the words "restraint of trade" and "monopoly."

But if you are going to introduce this new phrase, "unfair competition," into the law, you enter upon a sea of uncertainty. It took the Supreme Court 15 years or more before they got their bearings as to the meaning of restraint of trade and attempts at monopoly. The Sherman statute, as literally interpreted, was revolutionary. It was impossible to enforce it.

We forget, Mr. President, that we are dealing with society; that we are dealing with life; that law has its limitations; and that any law which undertakes to overthrow the habits, the customs, and the usages of the people can never be enforced. The Sherman Act as literally interpreted was simply nonenforceable as applied to the customs, the habits, and the usages of the American people.

Then came the second interpretation of the Sherman Act, which was based upon the rule that a mere incidental restraint of trade was not a violation of the act. That criterion was found to be uncertain, vague, and confusing. The Supreme Court then invoked the great rule of reason as the criterion and guide in the interpretation of the Sherman law. This rule of reason is the same as the law of nature in the Roman law, which led to its development until it spread over the civilized world. And the same great law of reason is the universal postulate underlying the common law. With this rule of reason as the criterion and standard, the Sherman law can be enforced to meet any possible combination of circumstances which may be considered in restraint of trade and detrimental to the public interests.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the able Senator from Massachusetts pardon me just for a reference?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I was very much attracted by the specific utterances of the able Senator from Rhode Island, and recalling his extensive experience and renown on the Federal bench, hearing his allusion to the view he had given the Sherman Trust Act and the failure of the statute to make specific definitions and the danger of indulging in general terms lest we should upset the usages of society, I invite the distinguished jurist, as I do the able Senator from Massachusetts, to the Supreme Court of the United States meeting the very suggestion of the able Senator from Rhode Island. I call his attention to the answer of the Supreme Court of the United States to the argument made by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island when made by eminent counsel representing the company before the court.

In answer to that form of argument the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> The merely generic enumeration which the statute makes of the acts—

Referring to the words "restraint of trade"— > to which it refers, and the absence of any definition of trade as used in the statute, leaves room for but one conclusion, which is that it was expressly designed, not to unduly limit the application of the act by precise definition, but, while clearly fixing a standard—that is, by defining the ulterior boundaries which could not be transgressed with impunity—to leave it to be determined by the light of reason, guided by the principles of law and the duty to apply and enforce the public policy embodied in the statute, in every given case, whether any particular act or contract was within the contemplation of the statute.

Therefore I beg to call to the able jurist's attention that our court, the very highest court, has seen fit to divorce itself from that which might seem to work an injustice now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Massachusetts has been very indulgent in yielding to interruptions, and if he will permit me, I should like to make a suggestion at this point somewhat in line with what the Senator from Rhode Island has said.

Section 5 provides "That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful." I have not any doubt that "unfair competition" is a term well known to the law. It occurs where one person attempts to impose upon the public his goods or his business as the goods or business of another.

I think that all the cases of unfair competition the courts have dealt with fall within that definition, the attempt of a person to impose on the public his goods or his business as the goods or the business of another. For example, we have a mineral water which is called "White Rock," and it is a well-known brand. Somebody undertakes to sell another mineral water, giving it a name resembling White Rock and pretending that it is White Rock. That is unfair competition. The violation of a trade-mark is a form of unfair competition.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator from Utah, whose opinion is worth very much more than mine on any such question, if in his judgment there is not now sufficient law to protect a trader in such matters?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, undoubtedly. I say "undoubtedly." I mean that that is my opinion.

The point I was going to make about that is this: If "unfair competition" as used in this proposed law is to be construed as I have stated it, it is a matter within the jurisdiction of the courts; it presents purely a judicial question. In other words, if we were to write into this law "that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful" and provide that a violation of the provision should be punishable by fine and imprisonment, there could be no doubt that the court would lay hold of that question, and whenever a violation of that provision of the statutes occurred a proceeding would be brought in the court. That, it seems to me, demonstrates that it presents a judicial question.

If section 5 means that and nothing more, then it seems to me there is a clear attempt to vest in this legislative commission judicial power—power that we can not exercise ourselves, and that a legislative body can not devolve upon a committee of itself or a commission created by it. We can only devolve upon any such commission the power which we ourselves have, and that is the legislative power.

Mr. WEEKS. Then I assume the Senator from Utah thinks this law which we are proposing to put on the statute books is unconstitutional?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it is utterly void, Mr. President, in that view. Now, if we take the other view that has been suggested by the Senator from Nevada and others, that it means something more than that, there is no limit to what it means. If we are to go only to the law books to ascertain what it means, and go no further than that, then its enforcement is an exercise of judicial power. If this commission is to go beyond that and declare that certain things which the courts have not already declared, and which existing law does not recognize to be unfair competition, are unfair competition, then we, it seems to me, have laid down no primary standard, and therefore we have devolved upon the commission legislative power, because if they are not restricted to settled legal rules in ascertaining the meaning of it then they are upon a sea of uncertainty, as the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] has said.

The commission make their own rules. One commission existing to-day may declare a certain thing to be unfair competion. Another commission differently constituted to-morrow may declare that that same thing is not unfair competition. It leaves everything to the discretion of the commission; it leaves it to their personal view, to their prejudices, and there is absolutely no standard laid down.

It seems to me that, conceding the point of view that it means what the law books say it means, and nothing more, then we have conferred judicial power upon the commission. If it is not to be restricted to that it leaves the commission an unbounded field in which to operate in declaring what shall constitute unfair competition, and in that view we have devolved legislative power upon that body.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to address my question to the Senator from Utah. Assuming that the words "unfair competition" have now a well-defined meaning in the law, is not the Senator of the opinion that if there were no other language in section 5 the courts, in construing the section, would give to those words their judicial construction?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am inclined to think so. If the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, I think the courts would hold that the expression "unfair competition," as I have said, has a well-settled meaning under the decisions of the courts; and I think the courts, when the question came before them, would hold that it was used in that sense. But if it be used in that sense, by what rule can we confer the power upon a legislative commission to deal with the question any more than we can any other thing that we might declare to be unlawful? Certainly if we would define what should constitute larceny and declare that larceny was unlawful, we could not devolve the power to forbid larceny or punish larceny upon a commission. It would have to remain with the courts.

Mr. LEWIS. While the Senator from Massachusetts is resting, and that he may get a breathing spell, I should like to address myself to the Senator from Utah. Do I understand correctly the Senator from Utah to assert as a legal proposition that it is not in the power of this body to vest judicial power in an administrative body?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say so most emphatically, Mr. President.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I ask if the Senator does not mean to assert that we have not the power to vest the execution of judicial processes in an administrative body? Otherwise the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine in the light of judicial decisions the meaning of a reasonable rate could not exist under the Senator's construction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no, Mr. President, that presents an altogether different question. The making of a rate, the fixing of a charge which shall be made by a public utility corporation or body is a legislative power. We could not devolve that power upon the court. We could not authorize a court to fix a rate that should be charged by a railroad company or by any other public utility company. It is legislative power, and that power has been devolved upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and properly devolved upon it. It is not a delegation of legislative power because we have fixed the primary standard.

Mr. LEWIS. Then may I say to the able Senator, if that be an argument, that body would have no right to determine what the word "rebate" meant. It would not have the right upon the logic urged by the able Senator to determine what would constitute a rebate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That does not seem to me to follow at all.

Mr. LEWIS. I think the Senator meant to say, and I should like to ask if this is not the limit of what he wished to urge, that it is not appropriate for this body to vest an administrative body with judicial functions to the extent of executing the processes of the law in the form of arrest, injunction, punishment for a violation? But is it not in the power of ;is body to vest in any administrative body that is authorized to investigate all the powers that shall be necessary to elicit the truth in that investigation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand the Senator, I answer him if we have the right to confer a power upon an administrative body we have the right to make the power effectual; but my contention is that we have no right to confer this power at all upon the administrative body; that it is a judicial power and belongs to the courts; that Congress itself can not exercise it. Suppose, for example, that Congress instead of undertaking to devolve this power upon an administrative body were itself to make an investigation of some particular case where it is claimed that unfair competition existed and Congress was to come to the conclusion that there existed unfair competition, does the Senator from Illinois think that Congress could issue an injunction against the continuance of that practice?

Mr. LEWIS. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If Congress could not issue it, it would be because it would not be a legislative power; it would be because it was a judicial power; and if Congress could not itself issue the injunction in that case by what rule of law, by what provision of the Constitution, can it devolve that same power upon a legislative commission?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, that is the very point I desire to attract the Senator's attention to—that he was really meaning to say that this body could not confer upon a commission power to execute judicial processes. I concur in that, but specifically press upon the Senator's attention that the power in an administrative body to make investigation to ascertain whether or not there has been a violation of things of a judicial nature does not confer judicial power, because if the illustration of the able Senator is accurate—that this commission can not ascertain what is unfair and pass a judgment as to a thing being unfair or not—the Agriculture Department would have had no right to ascertain what is adulteration in respect to food or what would make an accurate inspection, as I understand the Senator's position, merely because it wou'd not have the right to issue an injunction to avoid that adulteration of food.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, Mr. President, we might vest in a commission of this character—I am not absolutely certain about it, but I will concede, for the sake of the argument, that we might vest in a commission of this character—the power to investigate and ascertain whether or not unfair competition was being practiced, and then to present the result of their investigation to the Attorney General for prosecution, or themselves institute some sort of a proceeding in the court; but that is not what we do. We declare that unfair competition is unlawful, and then we say that this commission, whenever it has reason to believe that unfair competition is being practiced, shall itself issue an order bringing the parties that they suspect to be guilty of the practice before the commission; and if they find that their suspicions are well founded, then that commission issues an injunction. That is what we undertake to do, and that is purely the function of a court.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I fear the able Senator from Utah has misread the proposed law when he says it provides that the commission shall issue an injunction. I had the idea all the time that the Senator was laboring under one of two misapprehensions—that he either misapprehended the law as an abstract proposition or he misapprehended the contents of the bill. The Senator will see that his whole logic has been based upon a false premise.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me just one moment, the language of the bill is, in substance, that when the commission have reason to believe that an unfair method of competition is being practiced they shall bring the parties before them for an investigation—

And if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act—

That is, if it shall find that it is unlawful, against the law of the land—

it—

The commission—

shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same.

If that is not an injunction, I do not know what an injunction is.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I trespass upon the time of the Senator from Massachusetts just a moment?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not an injunction, of course, for nothing but a court can issue an injunction. We have in the interstate-commerce law a provision which confers upon that body the authority to investigate, at the suggestion of a shipper, whether or not the shipper has been overcharged, and upon that investigation to make an award in favor of the shipper, if it be found that an overcharge has occurred, and to command the railway company to pay to the shipper the amount so found to be overcharged. The Senator from Utah might just as well call that a judgment as to term the order of the trade commission commanding a person guilty of unfair competition to desist an injunction. It does not make any difference what words we use. I quite agree that the words "restrain" or "prohibit" are words that are ordinarily applied to judicial process, but that makes no difference. The commission has no power to issue an injunction. It could not enforce its injunction; it could not punish for contempt of an injunction. Therefore it remains merely an order, precisely as the order which the Interstate Commerce Commission enters every day in the year commanding railway companies to pay those that have been overcharged the amount of the overcharge. If the railway company refuses to pay, refuses to carry out the award, then the shipper can bring his suit upon the order in any court of competent jurisdiction, and the order of the commission is prima facie evidence of the justness of the claim.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, let me ask the Senator from Iowa a question: Suppose, instead of providing that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful, we were to provide that it should be unlawful for any person to enter the lands of another and cut down his ornamental trees. That presents a very well settled head of equity jurisdiction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Congress has no jurisdiction over those matters.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, suppose the legislature of a State were to so provide—the illustration would apply as well—or suppose that Congress were to provide in the District of Columbia, where it has jurisdiction, that it should be unlawful for any person in the District of Columbia to enter the lands of another and proceed to cut down his ornamental trees, and that if this commission or any other commission created should suspect that that sort of thing was going on that it could cite the parties before it, and if it found that they were cutting down the ornamental trees of the complaining persons, that it might issue an order restraining and prohibiting a continuation of the trespass.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to say that that could be done, but that has no pertinency to this inquiry; it is not parallel in any sense. We are here exercising the constitutional power to regulate commerce among the States, and any law that is a proper regulation of commerce we have a right to enact. If we believe that unfair competition—and I am now assuming that the phrase furnishes a sufficient guide, and not passing upon that question at this moment—ought to cease in interstate commerce, we have a right to prohibit it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And we have a right to prevent it in any way that we see fit——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I disagree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Save that we can not punish; we can not usurp judicial powers. Under our Constitution we can not send an offender to jail; we can not impose upon him a fine; we can not in any way trespass upon or invade the judicial functions; but if we can prevent the recurrence of unfair competition without recourse to fines, imprisonment, jail, or injunction, we have an ample and abundant constitutional authority to do so. The only limitation is the constitutional prohibition against invading the judicial power. The judicial power does not extend to the work which this commission is authorized to do.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator what power the commission does have, then, if it can neither punish nor fine? Does it give the person who is not satisfied the right to go into court?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that phase of it is not now up.

Mr. LANE. What good is it?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the person who has offended and against whom the order has been issued refuses to obey, then, of course, we must go to the courts to secure his obedience. There is no other way in which to secure obedience to the law.

Mr. LANE. If that is the only remedy offered by the bill, I have not much confidence in it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all the remedy that any statute we have offers. There is no statute upon any subject that can be enforced by penalties or by way of injunction except through the courts. I am sorry that the Senator from Oregon has lost his confidence in the courts. I have not lost mine, although I share possibly in some of his views with regard to their inadequacy.

Mr. LANE. I did not say I had lost my confidence in the courts, but I have lost my confidence in this commission if it can do nothing but allow a person to go to court. People already have that right.

Mr. CUMMINS. All the Interstate Commerce Commission does, all that the Attorney General does, all that anybody in this country does is to go finally to the courts if they want to enforce the statutes of the land.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have already trespassed upon the time of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]; but will he permit me to make a single observation to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa says we have the right to regulate interstate commerce, and, if I understand him correctly, he says we have a right to regulate it in anyway we please. I can not quite agree to that. We have a right, as the courts have held, to provide, for example, that lottery tickets shall not be carried from one State to another; that is a regulation of interstate commerce; but we certainly would not have the right to say that a commission can be given jurisdiction to inquire into the question as to whether or not a law forbidding the transportation of lottery tickets has been violated and to issue an order either final or preliminary in its character.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of our right to do just that thing—to pick up a lot of literature and determine whether it constitutes a lottery or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the Senator from Iowa thinks that we would have the right to devolve upon a commission the authority to ascertain whether the law forbidding the transportation of lottery tickets is being violated by an individual; and if so, to impose punishment upon him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, then we are so far apart——

Mr. LEWIS. That function is now exercised under the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That we have no common foundation upon which to proceed with this argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. Congress could do that, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator, upon reflection, will come to the conclusion that Congress can not do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope I would not come to that conclusion upon reflection. Congress is doing that all the time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me understand the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Congress can make any investigation it sees fit to ascertain whether or not the law is being violated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For what purpose?

Mr. CUMMINS. And if it is being violated, it can go to the courts to enforce the statute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not so certain about that. That is a very different thing from what I have been saying, namely, that Congress, having passed a law making a certain practice unlawful, may then investigate whether that law has been offended against; and if it ascertains that it has been broken, that it can impose a penalty.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not intended to say so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator did say so, although I think perhaps he did not intend to say so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope I did not say so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator says he did not say so, very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. There has been a misunderstanding. I have expressly declared that neither Congress nor the commission may impose a penalty. We can not confer upon a commission the power to impose a fine or to consign an offender to imprisonment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But we can issue a preliminary injunction.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what we do in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the Senator from Utah can use those words in that sense; he calls this an injunction, but it is not an injunction; it is just the same sort of order precisely that the Interstate Commerce Commission issues every day of its existence, and it issues such orders because it has found that under the facts the railroad company, or whoever may be within its jurisdiction, has violated the law. If a person or corporation sees fit to desist from an unlawful practice under this bill there will be no prosecution, because under section 5 it is not made a criminal offense at all; it is made unlawful, but it is not made criminal.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. I merely desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to inform the Senator from Iowa, or rather to refresh his recollection, that the very premises put by the able Senator from Utah exist now. If the Postmaster General, a mere administrative official, believes that a lottery is being conducted, and that the mails are being used to facilitate it, he has the right in his own manner to ascertain that fact by an investigation and to declare it, and after declaring it to add a punishment, such as forbidding the mails to the person engaged in the unlawful undertaking.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; and there are many such instances in our statutes and in the administration of our laws.

If I will not unduly interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts—and I am sure that he is willing that we shall now take up the time for a little while—I want to refer to another remark made by the Senator from Utah. He seems to assume that words can only receive significance or meaning through an interpretation of the courts; that "unfair competition" can not mean anything except what a court has said that those words mean. I entirely dissent from that. Our language is not made up by the courts; our language is made up in a hundred different ways. "Unfair competition" means what the people who use the English language commonly believe that those words mean; and it makes no difference whether they have been instructed by a decree or a judgment of a court or whether they have received that definition from a dictionary or whether they have received it from any other form of literature. It is to me a most astonishing proposition that when we use the words "unfair competition" in a law we are limited to what some court has said is unfair competition in a particular case. No court ever attempted to limit the words "unfair competition," but many a court has declared that certain facts established in a legal proceeding constituted unfair competition. Business men are just as potent in determining what unfair competition means as are the courts; the writers who make our literature, after observing the affairs of men, are just as influential in determining the meaning of unfair competition as are the courts.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. I suppose, as a general rule, that when words are used in a statute they are understood to be used in the legal sense in which they are known in the law; but that rule is not necessarily controlling. If the words "unfair competition" were taken in their legal sense, I think there can be little doubt that they would refer to such acts of competition as are tainted with fraud, with deceit to the public. Specifically, the words in a legal sense are used in trade-mark cases, where there is an element of fraud or deceit, such as palming off one man's goods as those of another; but if a court in reading those words should refer to the speech of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] or to the speeches of other Senators in this body, it might easily arrive at the conclusion that it was the intention of Congress to use these words in a broader sense.

The difficulty, in my mind, is to know in that broader sense what is the criterion by which any man is going to judge as to what is unfair competition. You must have some criterion in the law. The law is governed by principles, and you must have some guide.

Competition is a rivalry, a race, and fundamentally it may be said to be based upon something which is unfair, such as one man trying to get trade away from another. The common law, therefore, limits the term to those transactions which are in a way colored with fraud. But now, if you go beyond that to the ethical field, to the field of good morals, I should like to ask any Senator how he can determine the limits of that field, or what would be the criterion by which he would arrive at the conclusion as to what was fair or unfair.

If you should take the criterion which I should be rather inclined to take, namely, "such customs and uses as the business men of the country have recognized as fair dealing," then they have recognized everything as being fair in trade, not from the standpoint of that which is ethical, but everything which is not tainted in some way with deception or fraud upon the public.

I am simply saying that to use the words "unfair competition" in this statute, and to allow five men in the city of Washington to determine what is unfair competition in trade among 100,000,000 of people, is to me almost an absurd idea.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator from Rhode Island takes his seat I should like to address a question to him.

The Senator from Rhode Island has had extensive experience upon the Federal bench. I dare say he has tried some of these trust cases. In the trial of these cases evidence is generally put in pertaining to practices that are generally spoken of as "unfair competition." We listened yesterday to a recital of various kinds of unfair competition charged against the Harvester Trust in the prosecution now being conducted.

If the distinguished Senator were now on the bench, and he were trying one of these trust cases, and the Attorney General offered to put in testimony to show "unfair competition," would the distinguished Senator have no guide as to whether the testimony tendered properly falls within that designation?

Mr. COLT. That would not be the issue, would it? The issue would be restraint of trade.

Mr. WALSH. No, no. The Attorney General stands up and says: "I desire to put in some more testimony concerning unfair competition."

Mr. COLT. On what issue?

Mr. WALSH. On the issue raised in the action as to whether or not a trust exists—whether the defendant exists in violation of the Sherman law.

Mr. COLT. But on what action? What action is the Senator talking about?

Mr. WALSH. I am talking about a prosecution under the existing antitrust law.

Mr. COLT. There is no such issue as "unfair competition."

Mr. WALSH. No, no; I understand there is none.

Mr. COLT. There is an issue of "restraint of trade."

Mr. WALSH. But the Attorney General stands up and says to the court: "I want to put in some more testimony in relation to unfair competition." Would the court be so troubled about what "unfair competition" means that it would be unable to determine whether or not the particular testimony offered would fall under that designation?

Mr. COLT. The issue in antitrust cases, as a rule, is one of combination in restraint of trade, or an issue of circumstances and facts which tend to a monopoly. On that broad issue of a scheme or a plan to establish a combination in restraint of trade or to establish a monopoly, as going to show the intent to establish restraint of trade or to establish a monopoly, I would allow anything to go in which might be, from an ethical standpoint, in the nature of that which was unfair, not as going to prove that unfair competition was an offense under the statute, but as going to prove the main issue of an intent or design to carry out a combination in restraint of trade or to carry out an attempt at monopoly.

Mr. WALSH. Would the Senator regard those practices as properly designated as "unfair competition"?

Mr. COLT. Very likely in writing an opinion I would designate them as "unfair competition"; but just see, from the standpoint of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from New Hampshire, in his speech the other day, the extent to which you are going in unfair competition. See how you are going to hamper the ordinary business transactions and business practices in this great country.

Take the thread case. Every charge or allegation of unfair competition is to be taken as an offense under this trade-commission bill; everything contained in a decree which might be forbidden by the court as one of the elements going to show a conspiracy or a combination in restraint of trade, which might consist of twenty or a hundred different elements—every one of those details. Nay, more; they say that does not comprise all. That is only the beginning. The number is infinite. Five men sitting here in the city of Washington are going to exercise a police power over the vast business of this country and look into every transaction from an ethical standpoint, and if they determine that any of the ordinary business transactions in life are unfair according to their ethical standard, they are subject to the prohibition of this statute and are declared unlawful.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. KERN. I should like to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senate has had a good illustration this afternoon of what happens to a layman when he attempts to make a speech upon this subject. I hope it will take into consideration what will happen to the business man if this legislation is passed, when he gets into the hands of his lawyers, and later the courts.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not ask for the reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from New Hampshire asks for the reading of the amendment. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 5, as printed in the bill, it is proposed to insert:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HOLLIS to the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate commerce commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, viz: Amend section 5 as follows:

"SEC. 5. That unfair or oppressive competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

"The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair or oppressive methods of competition in commerce.

"Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has been or is using any unfair or oppressive method of competition in commerce, it shall issue and serve upon such corporation a written order, at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing it to appear before the commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by the commission requiring it to cease and desist from using such method of competition. The testimony in any such proceeding shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the commission. If upon such hearing the commission shall be of opinion that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act, it shall make a report in writing, in which it shall state its findings as to the facts relevant to the unlawfulness of such method of competition, and shall issue an order requiring such corporation to cease and desist from using the same. Until a transcript of the record in such hearing shall have been filed in a district court of the United States, as hereinafter provided, the commission may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or any order made or issued by it under this section.

"If such corporation fails or neglects to obey such order of the commission while the same is in effect, the commission may certify and file in the district court of the United States, within any district where the method of competition in question was used or where such corporation is located or carries on business a correct transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including all the testimony taken in the proceeding and the report and order of the commission. Upon such filing of the transcript the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to make and to enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript such orders and decrees as may be just and equitable. On motion of the commission, and on such notice as the court shall deem reasonable, the court shall set down the cause for summary final hearing upon such transcript. Upon such final hearing the findings of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated; but if either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may allow such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or before a master appointed by the court, and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem just.

"The commission may provide for the publication of its reports under this section in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use, and such authorized publications shall be competent evidence of the reports of the commission therein contained in all courts of the United States and of the several States."

L., p. 251), and acts supplementary thereto: Provided, That any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall not be changed or replaced within a period less than one year from and after the date of the promulgation thereof by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided further, That, subsequent to six months after the date section 3 of this act becomes effective, no change or replacement of any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall become effective until after one year's public notice thereof, which notice shall specify the date when the same is to become effective."

At the end of section 10 of the amendment insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"This section shall not be construed to apply to any contract of sale made in compliance with section 5 of this act."

In section 11, line 8, of the amendment strike out "1 cent" and insert in lieu thereof "2 cents."

In section 11, first line on page 11, of the amendment strike out "quality" and insert in lieu thereof "quantity."

In section 20, line 13, of the amendment strike out "the employment of" and insert in lieu thereof "to employ."

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to publish from time to time the results of investigations made in pursuance of this act."

In section 21, line 5, of the amendment strike out "three" and in lieu thereof insert "six."

In section 21, line 6, of the amendment strike out the period and insert: " : Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to any contract of sale of any cotton for future delivery mentioned in section 3 of this act which shall have been made prior to the date when said section 3 becomes effective."

And the House agree to the same.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 24, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, Almighty God our Father, for all that is truly noble, pure, and great in man; that the trend of his life from the beginning has been upward, not downward; forward, not backward; goodward, not badward; and we most fervently pray that under the spiritual leadership of the world's great Exemplar he may continue to grow until Thy kingdom shall come in every heart and Thy will be done in every life, that the name of our Father may be hallowed in all the earth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 16053, the general dam bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oregon rise?

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes on a matter of public importance.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I think we can accommodate the gentleman in Committee of the Whole. We will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will take no longer now than it will then.

Mr. ADAMSON. We can yield to the gentleman five minutes when we get into Committee of the Whole. I will do that with pleasure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 16053, the general dam bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16053) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 16053, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MONTAGUE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6084. An act to grant the consent of Congress for the county of Pulaski, State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; and

S. 4146. An act granting certain lands to school district No. 44, Chelan County, Wash.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bills of the following titles, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

H. R. 16345. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 17482. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 15959. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] such time as he may desire.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I ask the special attention of Members to this brief statement:

In 1908 Congress passed a resolution authorizing the Attorney General to begin a suit for forfeiture, or the enforcement of other remedies on the part of the Government, against the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., the successor in interest to the Oregon & California Railroad land-grant lands.

The grant provided that the land should be disposed of to actual settlers in tracts not to exceed 160 acres to any one person and for a price not to exceed $2.50 per acre.

The case was heard in Judge Wolverton's court, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oregon, on demurrer, and then on the merits, and in both instances the grant was held for forfeiture. But that is not the particular matter of which I wish to speak.

Immediately upon the passage of the resolution certain individuals throughout the United States began to represent themselves as authorized to place settlers on these lands, and others have acted as locators on their own individual responsibility, and their activities have covered the entire United States and Canada. These operations have continued more or less uninterruptedly since 1908. The representatives of the Department of Justice in Oregon have estimated that citizens of the United States have been mulcted of about a million and a half dollars for these alleged locations on the railroad lands. While the suit is pending, of course the ownership of the lands is in dispute. The railroad company has no right to sell them and the Government has no right to dispose of them while the suit is pending, and no person acting on his own authority has a right to make any representation to any citizen of the United States that he can locate him on a piece of this land and guarantee to him, directly or indirectly, that when the suit is decided he will receive the land with any assurance or certainty that this will result. But locators have represented to thousands and thousands of people that if they would pay them from $150 to $400 for a location they would "locate" them on a tract of land and that they would get their patent in due time. They have promised them patents in as short a period as within 90 days, and they have said to them that the railroad company had adopted this plan of getting settlers onto the land under the law, and then when the settler has received his patent under the original grant the railroad company will buy the land back from the supposed settler; and in the meantime if he was in unfortunate circumstances they would loan him a sum of money upon his location.

Of course all such representations are without foundation.

The Government is proceeding in the United States district court against these parties for fraudulent use of the mails. Several have been convicted. Others are on trial. It so develops that the parties who were engaged in "locating" people on these lands have different interests, and they are testifying one against the other. The fraud has been so widely spread throughout the United States, so many people have been misled, so much money has been taken from unsuspecting citizens, amounting to a million and a half of dollars, as estimated by the district attorney's office in Portland, that I thought it proper to call the attention of the House and the country to this matter, so that it may be stopped, and unsuspecting people may not be further misled.

They are taking the money from people who can ill afford to lose it; people of small means, earning a livelihood and having small resources. It is not only a public wrong, but a private wrong to all these people. As many as 50 filings have been sold on one location in the county of Marion, so the county recorder of that county reports. There are thousands and thousands of duplications in these so-called locations. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the newspaper reports of this trial, in order that the House may be informed of the matter. I have had a great many inquiries from all parts of the United States, and some from Members of the House regarding the matter, and, although these newspaper reports are somewhat long, they state the case very succinctly and clearly. On account of the large amount of money involved and the number of persons who are being misled, I think the insertion in the RECORD is justified. I ask unanimous consent to insert these newspaper extracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The newspaper extracts referred to are as follows:

[From the Morning Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., of July 14, 1914.]

FIFTY FILINGS SOLD ON SAME SECTION—MARION COUNTY OFFICIAL TELLS OF "LOCATORS"—STENOGRAPHER GIVES SECRET—LOGAN'S CONFEDERATE ANSWERS "BUZZER" AS "PROSPECT" CALLS—OFFICE METHODS SHOWN—STENOGRAPHER TESTIFIES THAT MEMBER OF CONCERN POSED AS BUYER OR SATISFIED CUSTOMER SO THAT OTHERS WOULD FOLLOW.

The methods said to have been used by the so-called Seattle group in inducing people to buy alleged fraudulent "locations" on Oregon & California land-grant lands were aired in the United States district court before Judge Bean when the trial of W. F. Minard, of Portland, and J. W. Logan and E. J. Sellers, of Tacoma, was resumed yesterday.

Clara Gaucher, stenographer for Logan at Tacoma, in 1911, told how a confederate of Logan's received a buzzer signal from Logan when a "prospect" entered the office.

CONFEDERATE IS "DELIGHTED."

This confederate, according to Miss Gaucher, then would enter the office, "introduce" himself, and either close a deal for a location before the "prospect's" eyes, or would say that he had just returned from examining land on which he had been "located" and was delighted with the "investment."

Max Hoffman, of Twodot, Mont., a New Thought preacher, was on the stand and told of his work as an agent for Minard, who, he said, represented himself as 'acting attorney" for the Oregon & California Railroad.

MINARD'S AGENT TELLS OF LETTER.

Hoffman said he received a letter from Minard at Portland in March, 1914, saying:

"The grand jury has just adjourned. The Government spent half a million dollars, called 343 witnesses, but couldn't indict me nor my confederates. I'm now a most noted man."

County Recorder A. Eugene Aufranc, of Marion County, told of having received as many as 50 "filings" for different people on the same quarter section of land, many of which were received on the same day and in the same affidavit from Minard.

Miss Blanche Reed, of Roseburg, deputy county recorder of Douglas County, gave testimony similar to Mr. Aufranc's, and Fred L. Colvig, county recorder of Jackson County, previously had testified that his office recorded "locations" on the same piece of land.

The modus operandi, as brought out in the testimony, was for one of Minard's agents to secure from the "prospect" a sum of money, varying with the amount of timber said to be on the quarter section of land selected by the "prospect."

TENINO MAN GIVES PRICE.

C. S. Vanderslice, of Tenino, Wash., testified yesterday that the "location" price in his case was to be $15 for each million feet of timber on his land.

The agent, retaining his commission, would forward the remainder of the "location fee" to Minard in Portland. Minard then would go through the form of offering the Southern Pacific Co., successors in interest to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., $2.50 an acre, or $400 for the certain quarter section selected by the "settler" or person whose money had been sent him.

The company would refuse to sell. Minard then would make affidavit that he had made application for the land for the "settler" and forward the affidavit with the "application" made by the "settler" to the county recorder of the county in which the land was located. The "application" would be recorded, returned to Minard, and by him to the "settler."

On cross-examination by Attorney J. C. Dennis, of Seattle, representing Logan, Vanderslice admitted that at no time had he had any intention of settling on the land on which he was "located." He did not even know whether Jackson County, where his selection was located, was in northern, southern, or eastern Oregon.

"GOOD PROPOSITION" SEEN.

Pressed by Attorney Dennis, Vanderslice insisted that in investing a total of $165, for which he expected to receive in return $5,500 within 60 or 90 days from the railroad company, he thought he "had a good business proposition."

He told of going to Seattle with one of the defendants, E. J. Sellers, also a resident of Tenino; of how Sellers learned of the opportunity to invest in railroad timber lands, told him of it, and of how he paid $157.50, which was to be the "location fee" for a one-half interest in two quarter sections, Sellers taking the other half of the deal.

He said that Henry J. Harper, who already has served a 30-day sentence following a plea of guilty to the charge of using the mails fraudulently, was the man who explained the plan to him in the presence of Logan.

Vanderslice said that he was told that the railroad company wanted to comply with the terms of the original grant by selling the land to settlers at $2.50 an acre, and that to do this it wanted to get "dummy" settlers, from whom it would buy the land back at a price of $15 for each million feet of timber and "get a clear title" for itself.

He understood that he was to be a "dummy," he said, but on cross-examination maintained that he considered the proceeding "legitimate."

Miss Gaucher, who was Logan's stenographer, was asked by District Attorney Reames to tell the jury all about a "bell code system" that she had mentioned as being used in Logan's office.

METHODS ARE EXPOSED.

"We had two rooms," said Miss Gaucher, "a private office and a general office, with a bell system between and a buzzer in the private office.

"By appointment, as people would come in and Mr. Logan would be talking to them he would press the buzzer, which would ring in the private office. Mr. Miller (J. B. Miller, of Tacoma, now dead) would then leave the private office, go out in the hall, and come in the general office as if he had come from the street. Then he would pose as a man who had just bought land or who had just come up from Oregon, where he had seen the land, or who wanted to buy land, according to the people that were in the office."

"As a matter of fact, Logan and Miller were working together?" asked Mr. Reames.

"They were," said the witness.

"Suppose," said Mr. Reames, "Mr. Logan had some one in the office who was about to purchase land, what would Mr. Miller say when going in?"

"Sometimes, but not always," replied Miss Gaucher, "he would go in and was ready to buy land; he had heard about it and the property appealed to him."

[From the Morning Oregonian, July 15, 1914.]

FRAUD PROFE NOW TURNED TO LOGAN—LAND-GRANT SALES ARE MADE WHOLE FAMILY—PRICE OF ARM BUYS "LOCATION"—ALLEGED ILLEGAL TRAFFIC COVERS FROM OCEAN TO OCEAN—FILINGS CALLED "CINCH"—"YOU CAN'T LOSE," WITNESSES SAY THEY WERE TOLD; "EITHER RECEIVERS WILL BE APPOINTED OR YOU WILL GET LIEU CHOICE."

That J. W. Logan, of Seattle, on trial in the United States district court, charged with fraudulent use of the mails, still was engaged in taking "applications" from prospective settlers on the Oregon & California Railroad grant lands as recently as last March, or three weeks after a secret indictment against him had been returned by the Federal grand jury here, was testified to yesterday in Judge Bean's court in the trial of Logan and W. F. Minard, of Portland, and E. J. Sellers, of Tacoma, who were indicted at the same time.

LOGAN NEW OBJECT OF ATTACK.

The Government prosecutors yesterday afternoon switched their guns from Minard, who had been under a heavy fire since the opening of the case last Friday, and concentrated their attack on Logan.

This was done under a ruling by Judge Bean, to which Claude Strahan, one of Minard's attorneys, saved an exception.

Judge Bean's ruling came after a contest between District Attorney Reames and J. C. Dennis, of Tacoma, attorney for Logan. Mr. Reames asked that evidence be admitted of Logan's acts as an individual, and not as a party to the alleged "conspiracy to defraud," with which he, Minard, and Sellers are jointly charged, these acts, Mr. Reames said, having occurred after the completion of the alleged "conspiracy."

Mr. Reames asked that this evidence be admitted as tending to show Logan's intent in his previous acts, for which he is on trial.

INTENT ONLY IS CONSIDERED.

As such, the evidence was admitted by Judge Bean, with an admonition to the jury that it could have no bearing on the charges against Minard and Sellers, or on those against Logan, except as showing his intent.

With yesterday's witnesses the extent of the alleged fraudulent operations of the men on trial was shown to have ranged from Seattle to Los Angeles and from Chicago to Portland.

Evidence was given showing how whole families invested in the "locations" on the railroad grant lands, and how a person, once a "locator," became an effective "booster," getting his friends to "invest" likewise.

One person to whom Logan sold an alleged fraudulent land location was Mrs. O. A. Brugler, of Watsonville, Cal., whose husband had procured a "location" from Logan three weeks before, according to their evidence.

INSURANCE BUYS LOCATION.

Brugler is a young stationary engineer. He has lost an arm and he explained that the $300 he and his wife paid for the two locations was received as insurance for the accident which crippled him.

"I explained to Logan that we only had a little money that I received for the loss of my arm," said Brugler, "and told him that I couldn't afford to take any chances. He told me I was taking no chances whatever."

Mr. Brugler told of Logan coming with her husband to their home to explain the plan whereby they were to get the railroad land.

"Mr. Logan told us there positively was no chance of our losing," she said, "and that the reason the railroad company wanted people to settle on the land was so they could get the timber.

"But there was no chance of our losing," she repeated, with emphasis. "If the Government won the suit against the railroad company, we would get the land, but the only way the railroad could win was to sell the land to settlers at $2.50 an acre."

Other witnesses gave similar testimony. All were emphatic that Logan had told them they couldn't lose.

LOCATIONS CALLED "CINCH."

"Logan said it was absolutely a cinch," said Thomas J. Prastor, a barber, of Tuolumne, Cal., who said that at least eight people in that town bought "locations" from Logan at $150 each at about the same time he did and afterwards.

He said that his attention first was called to Logan's proposition by an "ad" in a San Francisco paper, to which his brother-in-law directed his attention in June, 1913. He wrote to the "Oregon Realty Co.," which was advertising "homestead relinquishments," and Logan came to Tuolumne to see him.

G. F. Eade, now of Daly City, Cal., but formerly a grocer at Attica, Ind., told of meeting Logan in Chicago in September, 1912, as a result of an advertisement in a Chicago paper signed the "Oregon Development Co."

WHOLE EADE FAMILY BUYS.

Not only Eade, but nearly his whole family, according to his testimony, "invested" in Logan's proposition.

"Myself, my wife, my two sons, my brother-in-law, and his wife," he enumerated, naming 12 persons in all in the family who had paid $150 each, or a total of $1,800, to Logan for "locations."

"Did you ever get any of this money back?" asked District Attorney Reames of each of the witnesses.

"Not yet," was the invariable answer.

"Ever get any land?" pursued Mr. Reames.

"Not yet," was the reply in each case.

The name of Norman D. Cook, a San Francisco attorney, who is under indictment on charges similar to those on which Minard, Logan, and Sellers are being tried, bobbed up in the testimony several times during the day.

ATTORNEY COOK DISMISSED.

Cook had a hearing, beginning May 28, before United States Commissioner Krull, at San Francisco. Having heard some of the witnesses who appeared yesterday, Commissioner Krull dismissed Cook, not considering the evidence against him sufficient to send him to Portland for trial.

Logan represented himself as the representative of a "big Chicago syndicate," said Theodore Aarkrogh, an engineer in a refrigerating plant in San Francisco. The other witnesses told the same story. He met Logan in San Francisco, he said, in August, 1912, where the "Oregon Realty Co." had "three offices, with doors between."

"I was to pay $150 for a location fee, cruising, filing, attorney fees, etc.," said Aarkrogh. "I was to understand that I was giving up all right ever to file on a timber claim again. The railroad company's purpose, I was told, was to get settlers on the land, which was lying idle and involved a value of $10,000,000, as the railroad company would lose it if it could not get settlers on it.

"I was to get title not later than January, 1913," went on Aarkrogh. "The timber was to be taken off in three months after I got title, and I was to be paid a forfeit of $50 a month by the Oregon Railroad Co. if it was not removed. The Oregon Railroad Co. was the owner of the land, but had to sell it according to the grant of 1872 to get title."

FARMER GIVEN LURING PROMISE.

Hans Madsen, a farmer of Dublin, Alameda County, Cal., said Logan, at Pleasantown, 40 miles southeast of San Francisco, represented himself as a lawyer for a lumber company; that he paid Logan $150, with the understanding that he was to get the land in six months or a year.

"They were to pay me $30 a thousand for logs, making $2,500 for the timber on my land," said Madsen. "Four hundred was to pay the railroad company for the land, at $2.50 an acre, and the remaining $2,100 was to be given me. My land was to be in Lane County."

Logan's defense began to take definite shape yesterday, as Attorney Dennis in cross-examination made no attempt to rebut the witnesses, but tried to bring out that Logan had been open and public in his transactions, giving public lectures and acting as though he had the greatest faith in the scheme.

Attorney Dennis brought out that Logan had told the locators of the Government suit to forfeit the railroad's claim to the land, and that he had read and shown them passages in the Federal Court Reporter relating to the suit.

SPEECH NOT SHOWN WITNESS.

"Didn't Mr. Logan show you the speech delivered by Congressman LAFFERTY on this land-grant matter?" Attorney Dennis asked Thomas J. Praster, of Tuolumne, but the witness said "No," admitting that Logan, in his barber shop, displayed maps, abstracts, photographs of timber, and other data bearing on the land grant.

John McCourt, United States district attorney in 1911, told how Minard came to his office in that year to see him about his "proposition."

ATTORNEY M'COURT CALLED IT "BUNK."

"I told Minard that he was engaged in a 'bunk' game," said Mr. McCourt, "and that the Government was going after him if he didn't quit. He told me he was advised by his attorneys that he was within the law, and that he would persist in his course until advised to the contrary."

Emil Carlin, a restaurant employee of Los Angeles, told of meeting Logan, giving him $150 for a "location," and signing an option agreeing to sell the timber to Logan's company.

W. D. Fenton, counsel for the Oregon & California Railroad Co., who has handled the land-grant suits for the company since they were begun in September, 1908, gave a complete review of the litigation concerning the case in the morning session of the court.

The attitude of the company had always been that it was the owner of the lands and it had received patents to them, he testified, and accordingly held that it could sell them at any price and give deed at any time. No applicant has received any title to the land in the grant, according to Mr. Fenton, and they are considered as trespassers.

MINARD OR LOGAN NOT AGENTS.

He said that Minard was not an attorney of the Oregon & California and had acted without authority in so declaring himself. He denied that J. W. Logan is or ever has been an agent for the company.

"No locators have been given authority by us," said Mr. Fenton.

Representative A. W. LAFFERTY'S interest in the suit was touched upon by Mr. Fenton. He said that Mr. LAFFERTY represents 68 actual settlers on the 2,300,000 acres involved in the suit. Most of these are located either in Columbia County or in the northern part of the grant, according to Mr. Fenton.

[From the Morning Oregonian, July 16, 1914.]

CALIFORNIA PHOTOS FAKE OREGON LAND—LOGAN'S CHAUFFEUR AN ACCOMPLICE—100 "LOCATIONS" SOLD, SWORN—LAND-GRANT "SALESMAN" WOULD "LAUGH WHEN ALONE"—DIFFERENT STORIES TOLD—"OREGON REALTY CO." AND "OREGON TIMBER & LAND CO." ARE TWO CONCERNS "REPRESENTED" IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Kodak pictures of the famous sequoia, or big redwood, trees of California were used as fake pictures of Oregon timber by J. W. Logan, of Tacoma, in persuading Californians to buy "locations" on timberlands within the Oregon & California Railroad grant in Oregon, according to testimony given in United States district court yesterday by J. D. Stafford, a San Francisco chauffeur, who admitted he had been an accomplice of Logan.

STAFFORD CONTINUES "LOGAN CHAPTER."

Stafford's testimony came in the continuation of the "Logan chapter" of the trial of Logan, W. F. Minard, of Portland, and E. J. Sellers, of Tacoma, accused of fraudulent use of the mails in connection with the sale of "locations" on the railroad land grant, which has been forfeited to the Government by the United States district court for Oregon, the case now being on appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

Like much of the testimony given Tuesday, that of Stafford will have no bearing on the case against Minard and Sellers, and only on Logan's case in so far as it may show his intent in his previous activities in conjunction with Minard and Sellers. This testimony relates to Logan's acts subsequent to those for which he, Minard, and Sellers now are accused of using the mails in a "conspiracy to defraud."

CALAVERAS PICTURE IDENTIFIED.

Questioned by District Attorney Reames as to pictures used by Logan in his "location" selling campaign, Stafford said at least one of them was taken in Calaveras County, noted for its big trees, he and Logan having come among the giant timber in the automobile in which they canvassed the country around San Francisco for a radius of 150 or 160 miles.

"Logan suggested taking these pictures, because they would be good boost pictures," said Stafford, adding that they were taken by Logan. He identified a picture which showed himself sitting in an automobile, with the big trees for a background, as one taken under these circumstances.

Stafford told of being engaged as Logan's chauffeur for five or six months during the spring and summer of 1913, at which time, he said, Logan's headquarters were in San Francisco and Oakland. He said he had no other employment while working for Logan, except that he "boosted this O. & C. stuff."

100 LOCATIONS SOLD.

Stafford estimated that during the time he was with Logan more than 100 "locations" were sold at $150 each.

"Logan did business mainly with well-to-do people, didn't he?" asked J. C. Dennis, of Tacoma, Logan's attorney, on cross-examination.

"They all had $150," answered Stafford.

"Was there a difference in Logan when you were alone together, compared to when you were in the presence of prospective applicants?" asked District Attorney Reames.

"The thing was a joke to me, and to him, too," said Stafford. "He used to laugh about it when we were alone."

He said that Logan was serious and businesslike when there were "prospects" around.

"What would Logan say to you when you were approaching a town in the automobile?" asked Mr. Reames.

"WE'LL DYNAMITE IT" IS REPLY.

"He would say, 'We'll dynamite this place,'" said Stafford.

"Did you know what he meant by 'dynamite'?" asked Mr. Reames.

"I object to the form of the question," interposed Attorney Dennis.

"You knew that he didn't really mean that you were going to blow up the town?" persisted Mr. Reames, and Stafford said that he did.

Stafford said that Logan claimed to be representing different concerns at different times, among them the Oregon Realty Co. and the Oregon Timber & Land Co.

"Did you ever come right out and ask Logan as to the merits of the proposition?" asked Mr. Reames.

LOGAN "KIND OF LAUGHED."

"I asked him once," said Stafford, "and he kind of laughed and said, 'They may have a chance in 10 years or so.'"

Stafford identified the following advertisement, which was read to the jury, as one having been used by Logan in San Francisco newspapers to attract "prospects":

"GOVERNMENT LANDS.—Homestead relinquishments, 160 acres choice land, rich loam soil; 80 acres level, balance slightly rolling; two natural springs; good stream running through place; 20 acres cleared for cultivation; 40 acres pasture, fenced; green grass year around; some good green timber; three-room house, two additional rooms almost finished; plenty of furniture and cooking utensils; chicken house, smokehouse, barn 24 by 36; six tons hay; two work horses, wagon, farm implements; 100 chickens, mostly laying hens; two fresh cows; three hogs; two-seated hack; good road to station; 2½ miles to country school; large garden full of vegetables, some fruit trees, etc.; healthy climate; owner will relinquish his right and sacrifice for $1,200; terms, $500 cash down, balance to suit.—Box 3504, Examiner."

ADVERTISEMENT PRONOUNCED FAKE.

Stafford said that Logan, so far as he knew, had no such land for sale as that described in the advertisement, which was used as a means of getting in touch with prospects.

He said that Logan's method of presenting the scheme varied with the character of the prospect, but that Logan always would begin by asking a person if he had used his timberland right.

"Would he tell them about the Government's suit to recover the land?" asked District Attorney Reames.

"Not unless they knew something about it already," said Stafford.

He said Logan told "prospects" that "it was absolutely a sure thing, or we couldn't sell it."

Cross-examined, Stafford said he not only had heard all that he had been telling about but had "worked it himself."

CHAUFFEUR STANDS FIRM.

He stood firm on cross-examination, saying he never had a serious quarrel with Logan and was friendly to him yet.

Pressed by Attorney Dennis, he admitted going to Nevada and had worked the "location" scheme.

"Did you misrepresent?" asked Mr. Dennis.

"All the locators did."

"Did you, personally?"

"Yes; I did," said Stafford, with a shame-faced grin.

He said he never heard Logan say he represented the Oregon & California Railroad Co., but that Logan always claimed to represent a timber firm.

TWO HUNDRED TO THREE HUNDRED ACKNOWLEDGMENTS MADE.

R. J. McClelland, a Los Angeles notary public, said in 1912 and 1913 he was called to the office of Fred Brantner, who, he said, was apparently working with Logan, 200 or 300 times to take acknowledgments.

He said Logan, Brantner, and other would give the impression in a roundabout way that the railroad company was back of them.

George H. Veach, a harnessmaker of Watsonville, Cal., testified he had invested with Logan and had induced Watsonville friends to invest.

Attorney Dennis asked Veach if he had not been interested financially with Logan.

Veach denied with emphasis.

Producing three letters, Mr. Dennis asked Veach if he had ever seen them before.

With a red face, Veach admitted he had.

The letters, which were from Veach to Logan, were read to the jury by Mr. Dennis.

A fourth letter was produced, warning Logan that there was a little scare in Watsonville that Logan's proposition was a fake. Veach said the fourth letter had been written at the request of a post-office inspector as a decoy for Logan.

POSTAL INSPECTOR ON STAND.

M. M. Warren, the San Francisco post-office inspector for whom Veach wrote the fourth letter, testified as to the circumstances of meeting Veach and making arrangements with him to get evidence against Logan.

A. Karpoff, a machinist of West Berkeley, Cal., said he paid $50 and made a trip to Josephine County, Oreg., to see his land.

"Logan told me it was level," he said, "with 5,500,000 feet of timber. I found a hill impossible to climb, from which the timber had been cut 15 or 20 years ago."

He said he was one of several who started a suit against Logan in California.

He insisted Logan represented himself as a Government agent.

Logan apparently was undaunted by the testimony against him and watched the progress of the case alertly, frequently supplying his attorney with data and making suggestions.

The case will be continued to-day.

LAND CASE BRINGS FIRST PARDON NEWS—WILSON FREES "LOCATOR" WHO CONFESSED—SURPRISE SPRUNG IN COURT—HARPER DECLARES THAT IMMUNITY WAS NOT PROMISED—CLEMENCY LAID TO WIFE—FORMER MEMBER OF GROUP SELLING "LOCATIONS" ON DISPUTED PROPERTY TOO FLUENT IN TESTIMONY, IS CHECKED BY ATTORNEYS.

The fact that Henry J. Harper, a Tacoma barber who served 30 days for fraudulent use of the mails, has a full pardon from President Wilson, restoring his civil rights, first became public yesterday in the United States district court, with Judge Bean sitting, while Harper was on the witness stand as a witness against W. F. Minard, of Portland, and J. W. Logan and E. J. Sellers, of Tacoma, accused of the same offense.

Harper was a member of the so-called "Seattle group" of alleged fake land locators, of which Minard, Logan, and Sellers are alleged by the Government to have been members also.

OPERATIONS ARE EXTENSIVE.

These men, the Government alleges, conspired and used the mails in furtherance of the conspiracy to get persons to buy worthless "locations" from them on timberlands within the Oregon & California Railroad land grant in Oregon. This alleged fraud was country-wide, and the Federal authorities estimate that its operators obtained at least $1,500,000 by this means.

Harper's pardon, which was made a part of the record of the Minard-Logan-Sellers case, recites as reasons for its granting that the United States district attorney desired to use Harper as a witness, which would have been impossible without the pardon, and that there were extenuating circumstances connected with Harper's case, which, in the language of the instrument, were "sufficient to move" the President to grant it.

Harper said that he did not know that he had been pardoned or that a pardon was to be granted to him until notified by Mr. Reames last Tuesday.

WITNESS SHOWS EMOTION.

Having related his connection with the alleged fraudulent scheme and how he had spent six weeks in jail in Portland before his arraignment and plea of guilty, Harper was asked by Mr. Reames if he knew why he had received so light a sentence.

"Yes," he said.

"At whose solicitation was it?" asked Mr. Reames.

Harper did not answer at once. He turned his face aside and seemed overcome with emotion.

Urged by Mr. Reames, he answered in a choking voice, "My wife."

In what circumstances were your family while you were in jail?"

FAMILY LEFT DESTITUTE.

Harper admitted that they were destitute.

"How much of a family have you?"

"A girl 15," said Harper brokenly, "a boy 12, one 7, one 4, and one 3."

Harper said that from the time, of his own accord, he first went to Special Agent Byron, of the department of justice at Seattle, and told his story, he had received no promise of immunity or pardon.

He was working as "extra man" in a barber shop in Seattle in January, 1914, he said, when one morning he read in a newspaper that the Federal grand jury at Portland was about to investigate the Oregon & California land frauds.

WIFE COUNSELS CONFESSION.

"I went home to talk the matter over with my wife as soon as I read it," he continued. "I told her that it looked as though the whole thing was coming to a head, and that I believed the best thing was to go to some Government officer and tell the whole darn story.

"They will get me anyway," I said, "and we agreed that I couldn't run away." She said that if that was the way I felt about it that was the best thing to do.

"My wife had always said there would be trouble over it," he said. "She had tried to get me to stop it, and even burned some of the papers that I used in soliciting locations."

On cross-examination by Claude Strahan, attorney for Minard, Harper reiterated that he had acted throughout of his own volition, volunteering all the information that he gave to the Federal officials at all times.

"Where did you get the money to come to Portland before the grand jury?" asked Strahan.

MONEY DECLARED PERSONAL LOAN.

"I borrowed $9 from Mr. Byron," said the witness.

"Have you paid it back?"

"No."

Harper insisted, however, that Byron had given him the money with the understanding that it was not Government funds, but a personal loan, and that he expected it back.

Harper denied "scouting around" in Portland after he came as a grand-jury witness to get information against his former associates.

He denied telling inmates of the county jail that "if he had money he would fight," and that a Government agent had been there to get him to plead guilty, but admitted that he told other prisoners that he thought that "if his wife came down he could get off with a light sentence."

So rapidly did he talk and so closely did Attorney Strahan crowd him with questions that Miss Mary E. Bell, official court stenographer, was compelled to halt them several times to catch up, although she can take with ease the usual court proceedings.

Harper was voluble. He was willing to tell not only what Mr. Reames and Mr. Strahan wanted to know, but a great deal more, so that they had to stop him repeatedly.

He said that "telling the truth was no good" in selling the locations. He went to Grants Pass, he said, following Judge Wolverton's forfeiture decision in April, 1911, declaring the whole land grant restored to the United States, to see J. T. Burns, who had been selling "locations."

LYING DECLARED NECESSARY.

"Mr. Burns at this time was a very small weakling at the game," said Harper. "He had taken 'locations' as low as $2 apiece."

He said that Burns made money after he had told him how.

"His system of telling the truth was no good," said Harper.

"You found it necessary to resort to falsehood?" asked Strahan.

"Absolutely," said Harper. "I can prove that other agents told me it could not be done on the square."

He said he had tried it on the square and that the only "location" he got that way was from a logger, who knew he was taking a chance.

"The others wouldn't take a chance," he said.

He mentioned a North Yakima real estate man, B. S. Schneider, who had been a witness before him for the Government, and said that in Schneider's representations as a seller of locations "the truth was overshadowed by a lot of flowers." Schneider worked on a 50 per cent commission, he said.

Harper spared neither himself nor his former colleagues, and repeatedly mentioned Minard as having had knowledge that the "game was crooked."

HARPER SPENDS "EARNINGS."

Harper operated in North Yakima, where he first met Logan in 1909 through J. B. Miller, now dead. Having the proposition explained to him, he at once quit his job as a barber and went to work on commission. Later he became a full-fledged "locator." At that time he said they were charging $75 for locations, $15 of which went to Minard, the balance, after expenses were paid, being "split 50 50" between himself and Logan.

Telling of his first meeting with Minard at Seattle, Harper described Minard as being "a very prosperous-looking man, a whole lot more so than now."

He said Minard carried a gold-headed cane then, and as he talked the people in the court room turned their faces toward where Minard sat at the end of the attorney's table, a dejected figure in old clothes, wearing no collar, his face bearing a stubby three weeks' growth of gray beard, and his hands clasped over the curved head of an ancient black cane.

SEATTLE CONFERENCE RELATED.

The meeting in Seattle, Harper said, was attended by Minard, Miller, Logan, and himself. Harper had explained that he first went to work for Miller in North Yakima, but that when he had secured several locations Miller "ditched" him and left town without giving him his commissions.

Harper went to Coeur d'Alene, selling "locations," and paying little attention, he said, as to whether the same location was sold more than once. He was not there long and returned to North Yakima, where he remained a year, selling "probably 20 or 30" in that time.

Touching on Sellers' connections with the proposition, Harper said Sellers called him up in Seattle from Tenino, Wash., and told him he had a lot of people there who wanted to locate.

FOURTEEN BOOKED IN DAY.

"I went out to Tenino and wrote 14 that day," said Harper. "I made few representations. They weren't necessary. Sellers had the business all worked up. He got a commission of $15 for each."

Then, he said, he went back to Seattle and Sellers, Logan, and he went out to Cle Elum, where nine applications were written, Sellers getting $15 each. He said that Sellers did not pay for his own claim to his knowledge, and that he believed it was to be paid for in commissions.

Then he severed connection with Logan, he said, and he and Harper went to Tacoma and opened an office as "Harper & Sellers." This partnership, Harper said, continued five or six months, when he went back to Seattle and his trade as a barber.

A printed letterhead was introduced as evidence, bearing the words: "Harper & Sellers, promoters. We make it a business to take your ideas—we make them pay you—we pay ourselves."

Harper said he knew that the system he and Sellers adopted was crooked.

Frank F. Haight, a transfer man of Cle Elum, was a witness yesterday morning. He told of "investing" through the agency of Logan, Sellers & Harper.

He repeated the old story of being assured that it was a "sure thing," and that he "couldn't lose, whichever way the railroad suit went."

Logan, Sellers & Harper never told him there was a $17,000,000 mortgage on the railroad land, and if they had, he would never have invested, he said. He paid $300 for applications for himself and his wife for land in Douglas County.

Frank Holstrom, a Seattle street car motorman, said he was told that the land on which he "located," which he was to receive in 90 days, was worth $5,000.

Ludwig Wallin, of Tacoma, answered an advertisement, he said, and paid $75 for a "location" in Coos County, which was afterwards changed for one in Douglas County, for which he paid $50 more.

"They told me it would be better if I went right down there and settled," said Wallin, "and then when the suit was finished in the Oregon courts I would be an actual settler. They said I could get a cabin built for from $20 to $50 and offered to have a man build it."

He said Harper did most of the explaining.

The cross-examination of Harper will be continued to-day and the Government may rest its case then.

SEVENTY-FIVE FILE ON GRANT LANDS—APPLICANTS, CANADIANS, ARE ENTERED BY S. A. D. PUTER AT EUGENE.

EUGENE, OREG., July 16.

S. A. D. Puter, identified with the McKinley-Ware land dealings in Oregon, to-day filed 75 applications for the purchase of 160 acres each in the Oregon and California land grant. The applicants all were Canadians living in Montreal, Quebec Province.

Local abstractors who examined the applications found no two of them for the same piece of property. The applicants agreed to pay $400, or $2.50 an acre, which they tender through Alan McEwen, attorney in San Francisco. Lane County has thousands of such applications on file, although some timbermen consider them worthless. Applicants pay from $100 to $150 for the "locations."

GRANT LAND TRIAL SEEKS "OVERT ACTS"—"LOCATORS" CASE NOW IN SECOND STAGE—SIGNIFICANT LETTERS ARE READ—SELLERS'S PAST REPUTATION IS DEFENDED BY "BUYER"—HARPER'S NAME BOBS UP—MANY WITNESSES IN FEDERAL COURT TELL DEVICES USED TO INDUCE THEM TO PART WITH MONEY FOR RAILROAD FILINGS.

"LOCATIONS" IN LANE COUNTY ARE FOUND NOT TO BE LAND-GRANT LANDS.

EUGENE, OREG., July 17.

Highly developed orchard land, some of it donation land claims which have been held for 50 years and which never have been Oregon and California land-grant lands, are included in the "locations" made by W. F. Minard and J. W. Logan, whom the Government is trying for fraudulent use of the mails in Portland, according to the descriptions of six claims sent to B. F. Keeney, Lane County assessor, by Clarence L. Reames, United States attorney at Portland.

He writes that in some cases the lands were represented to carry from 10,000,000 to 16,000,000 feet of timber, and other tracts were advertised to be splendid fruit and agricultural lands.

Two of the claims described are part of the Bohrnstedt tract near Creswell and another covers highly developed orchard land near Creswell, owned by George M. Hawley, county commissioner; Frank E. Sly, John Schroeder, and R. D. Hawley. It has been settled half a century.

Proof of alleged "overt acts" was the object of testimony submitted by the Government prosecutors in the United States district court before Judge Bean yesterday in the trial of W. F. Minard, of Portland, and J. W. Logan and E. J. Sellers, of Tacoma, on a charge of conspiracy to use the mails fraudulently.

The submission of this testimony, for the purpose of showing that the mails were employed to further the alleged fraudulent scheme, was the second stage of the Government's case, evidence having been presented previously with the idea of showing fraudulent intent on the part of Minard, Logan, and Sellers as "locators" of settlers on timber claims included in the Oregon & California Railroad land grant in Oregon.

MINARD ADMITS WRITING LETTERS.

Letters admitted in court by Minard to have been written by him to persons who had bought "locations" on the grant lands were introduced by the Government as evidence of the alleged 15 overt acts.

These letters, the Government contends, were used by Logan, Sellers, and other selling agents for the purpose of inducing persons other than those to whom the letters were written to buy the alleged fake "locations."

The avidity with which the "opportunity" offered by the agents to file on a valuable piece of timberland was taken became apparent in the testimony of Norman W. Everts, a merchant of Tenino, Wash., who said that it took him three minutes to make the deal for his "location," and of S. E. Bunker, an ex-policeman at Cle Elum, Wash., who said that it took him 10 minutes to complete the transaction whereby he parted with $150.

WITNESSES HAD PRIOR KNOWLEDGE.

Everts and Bunker, however, said they had had previous knowledge of the proposition. Everts having been told of it first by Dr. Robson, of Tenino, who had bought a claim.

"I paid $135 and got nothing," said Everts. "I bought the claim from Harper and didn't see Logan. I met Sellers on the street and asked him about it, and Sellers said that it looked good enough to him to take a claim on his own judgment."

Sellers, he said, did not tell him about the proposition till afterwards.

"That was all right," said Everts, "I was going to buy on my own judgment."

SELLERS'S COMMISSION NOT KNOWN.

Everts, Bunker, and other witnesses said they did not know that Sellers was to receive a commission on their "locations."

D. B. Burcham, of Cle Elum, identified a letter as one that he received from Minard in Portland in November, 1911, telling him that his application had been filed, the application having been returned with the letter.

Burcham said Sellers gave him information, telling him that it came from Harper & Logan. He said he had known Sellers for 10 years, and that Sellers's reputation had been good.

Cross-examined by Attorney Strahan, representing Minard, Burcham said he understood at the time he made his application that Minard was "attorney for the Oregon & California Railroad Co."

OLD STORY IS REPEATED.

He reiterated the testimony given by so many witnesses preceding him that he was given to understand that he would get the land, whichever way the suit between the Government and the railroad for the possession of the grant should go.

"Didn't it strike you as inconsistent that Minard should be attorney for both you and the railroad company?" asked Attorney Strahan, on cross-examination.

"It didn't at the time I signed the papers and gave Harper my check for $300," said Burcham.

He had explained that the check was for two claims, one for his sister and one for himself.

CHECK STOPPED TOO LATE.

"But before I got to Seattle I thought of it," he continued. "I was in a hurry to make my train and signed the papers about 1 o'clock. I called up the bank the next day to stop payment on the check, but the cashier told me it had been cashed at 3.30 o'clock the day before."

He said he never had seen Logan and Harper before, but denied that he was depending on Sellers, whom he knew, as a guaranty that the deal was bona fide.

"Had you any notion of becoming an actual settler?" asked Attorney Strahan. What did you mean when, in your application, you signed an agreement to perform any and all acts required of settlers?"

OCCUPATION OF LAND NOT KNOWN.

"I don't know how to answer that," said Burcham. "I didn't intend to go down to Oregon and make my home on the land. I never was told it was necessary."

Other witnesses likewise said they had had no intention of making actual settlement on the land.

C. A. Betts, a Seattle physician, identified a check for $25 as one he had given Sellers in January, 1912, as a partial payment on a claim in Oregon. He said he had not received the money back and heard nothing from Sellers for about a year, or until he wrote to him and threatened to start criminal action if the money was not returned.

Dr. Betts said he also asked Sellers to return the power of attorney which he had given him.

Letters from Sellers to Dr. Betts were introduced, in which Sellers said he had been unable to find a piece of land for Dr. Betts, but that he still hoped to find one.

SELLERS OFFERS MONEY BACK.

"Didn't you send a letter to District Attorney Reames, when you learned that this case was coming up, offering your testimony?" asked John Ryan, of Seattle, Sellers's attorney.

"Yes" said Dr. Betts.

"Then all that's the matter with you is that you want your $25 back?" asked Mr. Ryan.

Dr. Betts denied this.

A letter from Minard to Frank F. Haight, of Cle Elum, dated November 14, 1911, was introduced as evidence of one of the alleged "overt acts," as was also one from Minard to M. B. Peterson, a Tenino merchant, and others to Cle Elum and Tenino people.

"My son-in-law wanted me to go into this thing," said Peterson, "but I told him it looked a little bit scaly."

LATER HE "BUYS LOCATION."

Later, he said, having had the matter explained by use of a map by Harper, he paid $105 for a claim, agreeing to pay $105 more when he should be furnished with an estimate of the timber on the land.

Mrs. B. Waddington, of Oak Harbor, Wash., formerly of Tenino, told of paying $165 to Harper for a "location."

E. E. Calhoun, of Cle Elum, said he paid $195 to Logan in Seattle, with the understanding that he was to get a deed to the land in not more than four months. His father and mother both took claims, he said, paying $315 for the two. Calhoun said that Logan gave him a specific description of his land, which was to have good, tillable soil, with only such underbrush as could be driven through with a horse.

Carl Peterson, of Seattle, was another who testified to having bought a "location."

HARPER'S ACTIVITIES BOB UP.

The activities of Harper, the Tacoma barber, who was indicted with the others, who pleaded guilty, served 30 days and was pardoned by the President so that he could be used as a witness, showed strongly through all the testimony introduced yesterday afternoon.

Harper, who was the Government's star witness Thursday, continued on the stand under cross-examination yesterday morning.

He repeated his testimony of the day before that Minard had told him to be careful about what he put in writing, and, questioned about the use of "acting attorney" on Minard's testimony, said that Minard told him that his attorneys said it was within the law, but that it often deceived people.

"I don't know that he used the word 'deceived,'" said Harper, "but that was the idea."

HARPER OPERATED ALONE.

He admitted that he operated in Seattle on his own account, that Minard's part was simply to file and return applications for a fee of $15, but insisted that Minard was the "head" of the scheme.

"When did you quit this business?" asked Attorney Strahan.

"I quit it four or five times."

"When did you quit last?"

"Last March."

He told how, returning from testifying before the grand jury last February, he had filed an application for a friend in Seattle, believing that the grand jury would not indict. He said he received no money for this application.

STORY BRANDED "A LIE."

"A lie from beginning to end," was Harper's answer to a question as to whether he had not told Minard, after he came down to appear before the grand jury, that he "could get him off for $50."

"Mr. Sellers, according to your belief," asked Attorney Ryan, "never did a wrong thing in connection with the Oregon & California, did he?"

"No," said Harper, "but he knew something was wrong."

Harper said he didn't think he had said, since the beginning of the case, that Sellers was innocent.

"I did say that I thought he was the best of the lot," he said.

Harper told of going with Sellers to see a Seattle attorney, John Mills Day, and of receiving a brief opinion from him that the grant-land settlers would receive their claims.

He said this was what caused Sellers to go into the "location" business, explaining that Sellers at the time was a diamond drill man, and expected to develop some coal lands near Tenino.

UPRIGHT LIFE QUALIFIED.

"You expect to live an upright, straight life?" asked Attorney Ryan.

"From this on, you mean?"

"Yes," said Ryan.

"Yes," replied Harper, and then, as though it had been a quick afterthought, "so far as this timber business is concerned."

Edwin G. Emme, a Portland attorney, identified a blank receipt signed by Harper which he said he had torn from a pad in Minard's office, expecting to use it in a case he expected to bring against Minard for clients who had bought "locations." When his clients gave up the idea of bringing suit, not wishing to "send good money after bad," Emme said he turned the receipt over to the grand jury.

Harper will be recalled to-day for further cross-examination by Sellers's counsel.

The Government will not rest its case until Monday, when B. D. Townsend, formerly special assistant to the Attorney General in charge of the case for the forfeiture of the railroad-grant lands to the Government, will be a witness.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, as it will be impossible for me to present what I desire in 10 minutes, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. What I wish to present, Mr. Chairman, is really a question of privilege, a question touching the privileges of the House, but as I wish to submit some observations which will not be privileged I have asked my friend to yield me some time.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 21, under the head of "Petitions," contained a brief as follows:

By Mr. Dyer: Petitions of 25,533 citizens of St. Louis, Mo., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

At the time this brief appeared in the RECORD it escaped my attention, but it was noticed in my home city of St. Louis. I received quite a large number of inquiries as to the authenticity of these petitions, my attention being called to the result of the vote on prohibition in St. Louis as well as in the State of Missouri. In 1910 Missouri voted on the question of State-wide prohibition, and the vote was as follows: Two hundred and seven thousand two hundred and eighty-one in favor and 425,406 against, a majority of over 218,000 against prohibition in the State of Missouri, which really means that out of three citizens two voted against and only one in favor. In the city of St. Louis the vote in favor was 8,247 and against the proposition 134,366. The readers of the RECORD seeing that brief naturally inquire how it was possible that 25,533 citizens could sign a petition in favor of prohibition when only 8,000 voted for it at the time there was a chance to engraft this alleged reform upon the constitution of the State. I immediately proceeded to make an investigation. I asked my colleague, Mr. Dyer, about that petition. He said he did not remember anything about it and was sure the petition did not come from him. His clerk made the same statement. She said the petition had not passed through her hands. The petition clerk of the House had no record of it, and when Mr. Dyer, who was a member of the Judiciary Committee, instituted an investigation in that committee it availed nothing; the petition could not be found.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I only have 10 minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Just for a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. It seems St. Louis has a way of toying with the liquor question. I remember on the floor of this House——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I yielded only for a question.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman recall that a Representative from St. Louis at one time introduced a prohibition resolution for the District of Columbia on the floor of this House—an amendment to the red-light bill? Does the gentleman recollect that?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes; and that was in order to test the sincerity of certain gentlemen on the floor of this House. But let me continue. My colleague, Mr. Dyer, finally received a letter from the Clerk of the House, which, by unanimous consent, was inserted in a later edition of the RECORD, and which reads as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1914.

Hon. L. C. DYER, Washington, D. C.

SIR: On March 21, 1914, the following brief appeared by mistake in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under the head of petitions: "By Mr. Dyer: Petitions of 25,533 citizens of St. Louis, Mo., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary."

It was discovered the next day that this petition did not come from St. Louis, and that it was not filed by Mr. Dyer. Proper corrections were made, and said brief does not appear in the permanent RECORD of the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,
SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House.

Later on I was informed the petition had been found. It was described to me as a single piece of paper, on which was written "25,533 citizens of St. Louis, petition for national prohibition," but in spite of all my efforts I have never been able to inspect it. In spite of quite a number of requests I made to be permitted to look at it, I have never been able to see it. The question arises, Mr. Chairman, if this petition did not come from St. Louis, as the Clerk testifies, where did it come from, who originated it, and who is responsible for its presentation here in the House? I am not going to make any charges, and I certainly acquit the clerks of the House of all blame in this matter; but it certainly looks to me as if this were a spurious petition and that we have to deal here with some sort of imposition upon the House to manufacture sentiment in favor of the proposition pending here now.

In this connection permit me to call the attention of the House to the peculiar character of these petitions which are being daily filed in favor of national prohibition. They evidently have all been printed on the same press. They have been sent out by an organized body of men, by agents who, according to their own testimony, are being paid for that kind of service, to all the clergymen of the United States, and these gentlemen take it upon themselves to sign them in behalf, not only of themselves, but in behalf of all the membership of their congregations. In other words, a clergyman would certify that such and such a church of 3,000 or 4,000 members prays for the enactment of national prohibition; but when you come to investigate and ask any of these 3,000 or 4,000 members of that particular church whether they knew anything about it, whether they are in favor of national prohibition or not, you will find that they are ignorant of it and have not approved of it, as has been found in the case of many churches in the city of St. Louis by investigation.

Mr. Chairman, while I am on the floor I desire to present to this House a number of genuine petitions that have reached me during the last two or three weeks protesting against the enactment of a constitutional amendment for national prohibition.

In briefly describing them I wish to say there are 1,589 individual telegrams, signed personally by the voters who sent them and who are not spoken for by anybody else, but they speak in their own behalf.

There are besides 3,525 other petitions, which I shall, in accordance with the rules of the House, deposit in the basket. These are all individually signed cards from my district protesting against action in favor of prohibition either at this or any other session.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in the allegation that he makes against the clergy, does the gentleman undertake to impugn the motives of any clergyman outside of the city of St. Louis?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do this, Mr. Chairman. I suppose these gentlemen take it for granted that when they themselves favor national prohibition the whole membership of their congregations is of the same opinion, and so they undertake to speak in behalf of the whole membership of their congregations.

Mr. LLOYD. As I understood you a moment ago, your charge was against the clergy of the United States?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I make no charge against the clergy of the United States.

Mr. LLOYD. The clergy of the United States are unquestionably a class of men who are concerned for the upbuilding of mankind, and the charge ought not to be made against any except those who may have been responsible for some exception.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman certainly will not impute to me any disrespect for the clergy. In this connection let me say, however, that, on principle, I do not believe in the church running the state. This is the case here; the church is trying to govern and rule and control the state. I am opposed to that policy.

Mr. LLOYD. But the gentleman will not say that any clergyman has not the same rights as has any citizen of the United States to assert his own convictions?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. When he says, "I, So-and-so, pastor of such-and-such church, petition Congress in favor of national prohibition," he is within his rights, but he has not the right, in my judgment, to certify in behalf of all the membership of his congregation unless he knows positively that they are all of one mind with him.

Mr. LLOYD. I was just trying to get at the statement you wish to be understood as making. Do you refer only to pastors of the churches in the city of St. Louis, or is the charge you make against the clergyman a sweeping charge against the clergymen of the whole country?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to make myself entirely clear on this subject. There have been petitions presented here by myself from clergymen of the city of St. Louis in behalf of certain churches, and they simply said, "So-and-So, the pastor, in behalf of fifteen hundred members of such-and-such a church." I made inquiries in St. Louis and I sent men to members of those particular churches, and their answer was that they did not know anything about such a petition, and, what is more, did not favor national prohibition. And yet the pastor of that church had undertaken to certify in their behalf to Congress that they were all favoring national prohibition.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the pastor of a church falsely certify as to his church?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No doubt he does it in good faith. He probably thinks that because he favors prohibition as a tenet of his church that every individual member of his congregation ought to do the same. He is simply mistaken in his judgment. I do not charge bad faith to him.

Mr. FOSTER. You see that would be a charge of bad faith if he would make such a statement.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman this: A minute ago, when he asked unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, do I understand that he intended to print these telegrams?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Oh, no. I want to print something else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I print the following pamphlets, which I have received, under the leave to extend my remarks:

PERSONAL LIBERTY.

[Address by Percy Andreae at the banquet of the American Association of Foreign Language Newspapers at New York City, February 7, 1914.]

"Mr. President, members of the American Association of Foreign Language Newspapers, and ladies and gentlemen, I once heard 'personal liberty' rather flippantly described as 'the privilege which every free-born citizen enjoys of preventing his neighbor from doing what he likes.'

"Sarcastic as it may sound, I am not at all sure that this definition of personal liberty, as practiced to-day by quite a goodly number of our fellow citizens, is entirely beside the truth. The fact is that the best of us are more prompt to recognize our own individual rights than we are to recognize the individual rights of our neighbor, and here perhaps lies the root of all that is controversial about the question of personal liberty to-day.

"For that the question of what constitutes personal liberty is a subject of controversy, and somewhat bitter controversy, in this enlightened age of ours is a fact admitting of no doubt. I venture to go further and assert that this great principle, for which men have fought and died in all ages, has perhaps never been in greater jeopardy, has never been subject to more insidious attack, than it is at the present day, when the word 'freedom' is on every man's lips, and the boast that man is his own sovereign forms the burden of every patriotic song.

"Of course the day of the despotic ruler, who sacrificed the liberties of the people on the altar of his own ambition is gone. We choose our own rulers, and even in many monarchical countries the voice of the people counts in government to-day as it never counted in history before. This means that we have gained our political liberty, and it is, of course, a mighty achievement to have wrested this great possession from the powerful few, who in past ages withheld it from us for the purpose of their own gain and aggrandizement. But, like all human achievements, it has brought with it its dangers as well as its blessings.

"Personal liberty, as we well know, is something quite distinct from political liberty, and the danger which we can never be careful enough to guard against is that the acquisition of the one may involve us in the loss or the curtailment of the other. When every man becomes potentially a lawmaker the temptation of the sovereign individual, both individually and collectively, to regard himself as his brother's keeper, called upon to direct and regulate his brother's conduct and habits and morals, is liable to create a system of tyranny which may prove to be even worse in its effects upon the community at large than the yoke of the ancient form of despotic government which we have succeeded in throwing off.

"Nowhere, it seems to me, does this truth apply with greater force than it does in this country, where the customs, the habits, the ideals, and the social needs of those who have made it their adopted home and refuge vary as much as the creeds and nationalities vary from which their ranks have been recruited. If one creed or nationality, even though it exceed all others in numbers, should seek by misuse of its political liberty to impose its particular customs, opinions, and beliefs upon the rest of the citizenship the conflict between political liberty and personal liberty must at once become acute, to the detriment not only of the individuals whose liberties are involved, but of the community as a whole. For there is only one way in which the issue of such a conflict can be determined. It must last until the rights of the individual are vindicated, because our individual rights are our heritage from nature, and no human power can permanently suppress them. They consist, not in the political rights which the many have obtained by conquest from the few, but in the natural rights which each of us must seek from the other, each of us must concede to the other, and each of us must defend from the other and for the other as long as the world lasts—the God-given rights of individual man as distinguished from the man-given rights of the community of which he forms a constituent part.

"There is no need to define what these rights are. The history of government has long ago defined them for all of us, and their limits have been set, and will always be set, by actual experience.

"But here is the crux of this whole great question as it confronts us to-day. It is just history, and the experience of those who lived before us, which are strangely lost sight of in the tendencies of many of our present-day reformers. They suffer from a perfect rage, not only to accelerate the slow and steady processes of nature, but to correct and even arrest them, and since the making of laws is now in our own hands they demand that we shall devote our lawmaking power, not only to the correction of the defects of our weaker fellow men, but to the correction of that which they believe to be the defects of nature herself, who created those weaker fellow men.

"Education has become, to them, a mere secondary auxiliary in shaping our lightning course toward perfection. Mankind, if we are to believe them, can be made honest, and righteous, and sober, and moral, and what not, by a mere stroke of the legislative pen. The stern truth is forgotten, which history has so often and so painfully impressed upon humanity, that law can successfully concern itself only with the actions of man toward man, but can never determine or control the actions of individual man in such matters as concern himself alone.

"Under the circumstances, then, it is scarcely surprising that all the activities of that particular class of reformers which I am describing should proceed from a basis which is the very opposite from that upon which our civilization and general social structure have been erected. For whereas law, as we generally understand it, has always sprung from and been established by custom, they are to-day trying to reverse the process and establish custom by law. Whereas we have hitherto largely left it to nature to deal with the small percentage of defectives she produces, and have made our customs and usages conform to the character of the huge percentage of normal beings, they are to-day adopting the opposite course and are not only attempting to take the defectives out of nature's experienced hands, but are actually demanding of normal man that he shall shape his customs and his habits to suit the needs and the weaknesses of the comparatively few defectives among us.

"In saying this I am not casting any doubt upon the motives of these good people. They are excellent, of course. But the question is not whether their motives are excellent, but whether by acting upon them they will attain the excellent object they are seeking to obtain.

"The fact is that we can not by law subordinate the faculties of the strong to the needs of the weak without destroying the very essence of that which has made the majority of men to-day the strong, reliant, and competent beings they are—their personal liberty. It is true that wise laws have done much to direct the activities of men into worthy channels, even more perhaps than unwise laws have undone. But our would-be uplifters forget that individual man himself has risen, and is still rising, above the inherent weakness of all animal nature, not by compulsion of law, or by the coercion of his superiors, but by reason of the exercise of his God-given individual free will, his power of self-restraint, and by those higher faculties which religion and culture have developed in him.

"If we once deprive men of the right and the opportunity to exercise these faculties, the result must be, if nature's work is any criterion, not that the weak will be raised to the level of the strong, but that the strong will be lowered to the level of the weak. If we sacrifice the independence of the many in order to protect the frailty of the few, we shall not only destroy the source from which the many derive their strength, but shall still further accentuate the dependence of the few, to whom a share of that strength has been denied. Charity affords the best proof of the truth of this. For who does not know that charity, which aims to relieve poverty, is the most fruitful producer of paupers?

"This, then, is the real and most stupendous danger that confronts us wherever we are confronted with the curtailment of our personal liberty, not as those who affect to sneer at that liberty pretend, the mere sacrifice of our individual pleasures, our individual indulgencies, or the satisfaction of our individual social needs. These are minor incidents of this great question, dear to our hearts, of course, but mere trifles compared with the greater considerations involved.

"Now, there is nothing new in all this, and certainly nothing new to you, many of whom are far abler exponents and far doughtier champions of the principles I have been asked to discuss here than I can ever hope to be. No man, indeed, who has studied the history of government, and in particular the limitations of the law-making power, as evidenced by its many disastrous failures in all ages and under every variety of conditions, needs to be told that the safeguarding of that which we call the personal liberty of man is the primary and most vital essential to all human progress, and that no law affecting that liberty in the slightest particular, however charitable, however estimable the motives may appear that prompt it, can be enacted without danger to the whole system upon which our civilization is founded.

"Unhappily, the men who have acquired this knowledge and who possess this experience are only too often not the men who assemble in our legislative halls, with the mandate of the people to make their laws for them; and here we have an anomalous condition presented to us, which has often puzzled me and which I offer for your earnest thought and consideration.

"We demand of every profession upon which, directly or indirectly, the public welfare is dependent that its members, before being permitted to enter it, shall receive previous instruction and training at the hands of those whose knowledge and experience of all its intricacies have been acquired by diligent study and wide practice. I say we demand this of every profession, excepting one—that of the lawmaker. The physician, the jurist, the teacher, and the preacher are required to give evidence of their fitness to follow their respective professions before they are licensed to practice them. Yet the most important profession of all—that of the lawmaker—is open unconditionally to every adult citizen, and its members are selected by the people haphazard, without inquiry into their fitness and without consideration of their knowledge and experience of the intricate problems of law and government with which the world has grappled since history began.

"Is it entirely to be wondered at that legislation, under these circumstances, frequently runs riot and that it is guided by impulse and sentiment and by the often artificially created clamor of the untutored multitude, rather than by logic and reason and the caution that comes with accumulated knowledge and training? Our schools and universities teach the evolution of law, the interpretation of law, and the practice of law. But the science which concerns itself with the effect and the bearings of law, the science which defines the true scope of legislation and inculcates the lessons to be learned from its successes and failures, the science, in short, which deals with the natural restrictions and limitations of the lawmaking power, has, I believe, no chair in any university in the world.

"Is this condition subject to remedy, or would any change in it be incompatible with the preservation of our political liberty? It would be a bold man who presumed to answer the question offhand. But whether it be subject to remedy or not, the condition itself, I submit, is the primary cause of the multitude of freak laws which clog our statute books, the dead-letter laws which breed among us so much pestilent contempt of duly constituted authority—those unburied corpses, in other words, that bestrew the battlefield on which political liberty and personal liberty are to-day so fiercely contending for their respective rights.

"The victory at this day is still with personal liberty. But for how long? The forces of tyranny and oppression are ever with us, and they surround that battlefield to-day in their full array, awaiting the opportunity to fall upon both champions and bind them hand and foot with the chains forged by fanaticism and intolerance.

"And if these forces should ever accomplish their purpose, what then? Read the printed publications and the open declarations of these insidious foes of the liberties which the millions of your best and sturdiest fellow citizens came to this great Republic to preserve and enjoy, and they will tell you. 'What then?' They will tell you, as nothing else can tell you, that if there is one prayer more than any other which every true citizen of this great country should offer up morn and night to the Giver of all things it is the prayer that our free America may be preserved from the curse of racial and social and religious prejudices and intolerances, for they are the harbingers of disaster to all that we cherish under the name of freedom and liberty."

ADDRESS ON NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION AND ITS EFFECT UPON THE AMERICAN HOTELS AND THEIR PATRONS, BY PERCY ANDREAE.

[Delivered before the American Hotel Protective Association of the United States and Canada at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, on April 14, 1914.]

Resolution passed unanimously by the National Hotelkeepers' Association of the United States and Canada at its convention in New York on April 14, 1914.

Resolved, That this association call upon every hotel in the United States to join in taking a poll of its guests upon the resolutions for nation-wide prohibition of the manufacture, sale, and importation of alcoholic beverages now pending in Congress; that the president appoint a committee of three members with power to appoint subcommittees in every State, which committee shall be charged with all arrangements necessary for the carrying out of this poll all over the United States on such day or days as may be hereafter determined by the said committee.

Resolved, furthermore, That the offer of the National Association of Commerce and Labor to place its organization at the disposal of this association for the purpose of securing this poll be accepted, and that the committee be instructed to communicate with the clubs of the country and invite them to cooperate in this work by taking a similar poll of their own members.

Be it also resolved, That the result of such poll when completed be presented to the Congress of the United States through the proper channels by the president of this association and the said committee.

"Mr. President and gentlemen, before I approach the subject upon which you have honored me with an invitation to speak before you to-day, permit me to say that I believe it to be neither your desire to listen to my views, or to anyone else's views, on that subject in its moral, ethical, or sociological bearings, nor my province to discuss such views before a gathering of this kind. The question whether men shall continue to exercise the right they have enjoyed from time immemorial to drink wines, beers, and other alcoholic stimulants has, unfortunately, within recent years passed beyond the realm of opinion and become, at least on the part of those who take the negative side of this question, a matter of dogma pure and simple, and you can not argue with a man on a matter of creed, nor reason with him on a question of faith.

"There is, however, one incontrovertible fact bearing on this question which no one interested in its solution can afford to ignore, and that is that a very large proportion of mankind does exercise this right, in its opinion without detriment either to itself or to others, and that it is not likely, without a struggle, to surrender that right merely because a certain percentage of men does not exercise it as judiciously as it might, or because a certain other percentage of men has firmly determined in its own mind that mankind as a whole shall go without it.

"Now, mankind as a whole is a pretty big fellow, and has certainly some claim to be consulted in a matter so personal to itself as the one we are reviewing, and it is from this standpoint, the correctness of which few will doubt, that I propose to lay before you—whom I may, I think, fitly describe as the housekeepers of the Nation at large—the question of prohibition as it confronts the country to-day.

"There are at present, as you all probably know, three resolutions pending before the Congress of the United States—two providing for an amendment to the Federal Constitution by virtue of which the manufacture, sale, and importation of alcoholic beverages are to be forever prohibited in this country, and the third providing for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of distilled liquor. The passage of a resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States requires a two-thirds affirmative vote in both Houses of Congress, and the further ratification of that vote by three-fourths of the legislatures of the 48 States comprising the Union, before such amendment can become part of the basic law of the country.

"On the face of it, then, it would seem as if nothing short of the overwhelming consent of the people at large were required to give effect to the desire of those who aim to impose this drastic law upon the whole Nation. But the real fact is just the reverse.

"The action now asked of Congress is the mere submission to the legislatures of the individual States of the question, 'Shall the people of this country, by an alteration of the Federal Constitution, be deprived of the personal privilege of obtaining alcoholic beverages?' The individual Congressman, therefore, is not required to cast his vote either for or against depriving the people of that privilege, but ostensibly merely in favor of allowing the people to decide for themselves whether they shall be so deprived. I say ostensibly, because, as I shall show you later on, it is not the people who will eventually decide this question, but a comparatively insignificant minority of the people. Now, though considerably more than one-third of the Members of Congress may be, and, according to the belief of many, actually are personally opposed to the principle of prohibition, yet such is the vindictive passion with which this principle is insisted on by those who wish to see it established, and so relentless and unscrupulous their persecution and vilification of those who oppose them, either politically or otherwise, that the average Congressman is only too glad to avail himself of the opportunity to compromise, on the one hand with them, and on the other hand with his own conscience, by consenting to leave the final determination of the question to the country at large.

"It is this fact which renders the passage of one or the other of the resolutions in question, should either ever reach the floor of Congress, an almost universally admitted certainty, though only a minority of the representatives of the people may favor the amendment themselves.

"The same condition, only in a greatly aggravated degree, attends the ratification of the resolution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States of the Union. Here, too, the general impression is that, if ratified, an overwhelming majority of the people will have approved the resolution, whereas the fact is that a comparatively small minority of the people will have the power to give final effect to the resolution against the desire and the will of the rest of the community. And for this reason: Each of the 48 States is entitled to cast through its legislature one vote on the question, so that, for instance, the State of Nevada, with a little over 80,000 population, has exactly the same voice in deciding it as the State of New York has with her population of over 9,000,000 souls. Nay, a mere majority of Nevada's voters, since a majority determines the attitude of the legislature on such a question, can offset the entire voting strength of the State of New York, even if every voter in that State were opposed to that which a bare majority of Nevada's voters favored. Indeed, if you review the 48 States in the order of their population, you will find that 36 States with a total population of just over 40,000,000 will outvote by a mere majority of those 40,000,000 the remaining 12 States with a total population of nearly 54,000,000, though every single one of those 54,000,000 people were opposed to that which the majority of the 40,000,000 favored.

"I think you will admit, quite aside from the merits or demerits of the question itself, that this is an extraordinarily dangerous situation, overshadowing all the moral, economical, and industrial aspects which that question presents. In other words, whatever the opinion of individual men may be with regard to these latter aspects, and they are, of course, subject to opinion and open to argument, though the Prohibitionist arbitrarily denies this fact, there can surely be only one opinion regarding the desirability, or indeed the possibility, of imposing the will of a comparatively small minority of men upon a very large majority in a matter so closely affecting the most cherished and hitherto undisputed right of the individual to pursue his own personal customs, whether good, bad, or indifferent, and to regulate his own conduct within the four walls of his own home.

"This is the main aspect of this many-angled question which I desire to present to you, and if I confine myself to it almost exclusively, it is for the reason that its other aspects have been so fully discussed that I could hardly hope to add anything new to that which has already been said about them. That the resolution aiming to prohibit the individual from drinking wines, beers, and other liquors in his own home incidentally contemplates the destruction of over a thousand million dollars' worth of property without compensating those who, under the sanction and the implied guaranty of the law, have invested their means in that property, and without reimbursing them for the loss of a business which they have established, not to create but to meet a public demand, the legitimacy of which even those who aim to destroy the supply have never ventured to question, is, of course, a matter of very grave import, affecting the stability of all and every other kind of business and the sacredness of all and every other kind of property right. But you know this as well as I do. Indeed, in so far as your own business has of necessity been so arranged as to comply with this demand of the public, you are yourselves personally interested in this aspect and therefore more competent than I am to judge in how far your own business and property rights will be affected.

"On the other hand, that the attempt to compel the people to abstain from the use of beers, wines, and other liquors will throw 2,000,000 wage earners upon the already overstocked labor market of the country is, at least in my estimation, a consideration of even greater moment than the question of property loss, and weighs far more heavily in the scales against the so-called moral aspect of this whole question, which the advocates of prohibition so strongly insist upon.

"These advocates deny the injurious result of prohibition to the workingman, claiming, in the first place, that the money spent for beers, wines, and other liquors goes only to a very small extent toward the payment of labor; and, in the second place, that such labor as may be dislodged by prohibition will be quickly absorbed in other trades, whose business will be enormously increased by the purchases of necessities made with the moneys the people will save when they cease spending anything for drink.

"I would like, if you will permit me to digress for a few moments from what I have called the main aspect of the question, to point out the obvious fallacies upon which these two very random assertions are based, and incidentally to bring to your attention the extraordinary want of the sense of proportion which is the characteristic feature of all the reasoning of these excellent people, and which unfortunately infects those whom they influence.

"The annual drink bill of the United States, according to Government statistics, approximates $2,000,000,000. A certain clergyman, not a prohibitionist, but a temperance advocate, as I hope we all are, happened recently to cull this interesting fact from a prohibition paper, together with the statement accompanying it to the effect that only a very small percentage of this huge amount went in payment for labor, and he was so exercised by what he called this staggering revelation of the excessive indulgence in drink on the part of the people, and the waste of money it involved, that he issued a statement insisting that something should be done to eradicate an evil which was evidently sapping the very vitals of humanity, and would shortly result in leaving only a handful of temperate individuals, like himself, to people the earth.

"Now, I have no doubt that this statement, like many other statements from similar sources, was religiously accepted as a fact by hundreds of good and well-meaning people, who, following the example of their pastor, had seen nothing wrong in indulging temperately in what I may call the liquid pleasures of the table, but who, with this alleged proof of the intemperance of the majority of their fellow citizens confronting them, felt that probably nothing short of absolute general prohibition was capable of saving the human race from rapid total extinction.

"But what is the real truth? First and foremost, the real truth is that this worthy clergyman has utterly failed to realize what a big country he is living in. There are upward of 93,000,000 people in the United States, and if you divide 93,000,000 people into $2,000,000,000 per annum, you will find that it produces a little over $21 per head per annum, or less than 6 cents per head per day spent in drink. This is less than the average cost of a pint bottle of beer at retail. The pastor in question, therefore, who considers he is indulging temperately when he takes a pint of beer for lunch, and another pint of beer for dinner, is in reality consuming, by his own reckoning, just double his average proportion of what he calls the staggering excess of drink consumed by the Nation at large, and consequently, if his prediction regarding the impending extinction of the human race owing to excessive drinking is correct, he himself will not be included in the handful of temperate men who will soon be left over to people the earth.

"He does not realize, in short, that if only half of the population of the United States drinks in just the same proportion as he does, the Nation's drink bill will still amount to $2,000,000,000.

"But what is of greater significance is that he does not realize that every cent of this $2,000,000,000 spent in drink, including the $225,000,000 which goes in the form of taxes to the Government of the United States, pays for labor, since the market value of every commodity which nature brings forth represents just exactly the sum total of the wages paid for the labor employed in producing and bringing it to the market, plus the interest on the capital required to set such labor in motion, which is itself nothing more than the accumulated product of labor, and can not be expended except in payment for labor. Only the earth, in fact, works without pay. Hence, if $2,000,000,000 worth of drink is not produced and consumed, something else must be produced and consumed, and something else must be taxed in its stead, in order, respectively, to make up for the loss of nearly a quarter of a billion dollars in the Government's annual revenues, and to give employment to at least 2,000,000 wage earners who depend for their existence and that of their families upon the Nation's drink bill.

"The theoretical mind of the Prohibitionist brushes these practical difficulties aside as if they were too paltry for serious consideration. But, then, as a rule he has no personal risk in the experiment he is suggesting, and can therefore bravely afford to let both the capitalist and the workingman take their chances. He is simply satisfied in his own mind that 2,000,000 laboring men can easily find employment in other trades, because he assumes that when all men cease drinking they will promptly spend $2,000,000,000 a year more for clothes, shoes, hats, gloves, and other commodities, which labor must produce. Nor is he at all concerned about the revenues of the Government, because he is equally satisfied in his own mind that when people are once deprived of the means of obtaining alcohol all poorhouses, insane asylums, jails, and most of the law courts will go out of existence—dislodging more labor, by the way—and the sum thus saved to the Government in the maintenance of these institutions will more than balance the loss of revenue from the sale of wines, beers, and other liquors.

"Alas, it is needless to discuss all these beautiful theories, because they are all based upon the one fundamental fallacy that if the manufacture, sale, and importation of alcoholic beverages is prohibited men will cease drinking such beverages. The fact is that the existence of breweries, distilleries, and wineries is the effect and not the cause of men's inclination to drink, and their destruction and the abolition of the sale of wines, beers, and other liquors in hotels, stores, or similar establishments can neither destroy the desire of men to obtain these commodities nor deprive them of the means of doing so. Those who ignore this obvious fact forget that men drank, some unhappily to excess, long before breweries, distilleries, and wineries were built, because there is nothing that grows in nature from which alcohol can not easily be obtained in practically unlimited quantities by all who desire it, and that the number of those who do desire it is overwhelmingly large is proved beyond the peradventure of a doubt by our Nation's annual drink bill of $2,000,000,000. In other words, breweries, distilleries, and wineries were not established for the mere purpose of providing men with alcohol, which they had theretofore just as easily, and perhaps more cheaply, produced for themselves, but for the purpose of providing them with alcohol unmixed with the various attendant poisons that accompany it whenever produced by the crude and unscientific methods of private manufacture.

"Go into any prohibition State and sample the fearful alcoholic concoctions with which the people there supply themselves in lieu, and usually in excess, of the purified article they are prevented from obtaining, and you will find ample proof of my statement. In short, as Mark Twain has so quaintly put it: 'Since men can get their tipple out of a table leg or a wooden fence rail, what is the use of talking about prohibition?'

"Gentlemen, I have dwelt upon these facts not in order to convince you of their truth, because their truth is as old as the hills, but in order to establish the conclusion that the Nation's drink bill, which the Prohibitionist points to as proof of the necessity for prohibition, is, on the contrary, the strongest conceivable proof of its futility. If this conclusion is wrong, the sooner we find it out, without putting it to the dangerous test of statutory law, the better, and there is no body of men in this country better equipped to find it out than you are. I will go further and say that there are no men upon whom the duty is more clearly laid to find it out than you.

"I took the liberty of referring to you at the outset of my address as the housekeepers of the Nation, and you assuredly are. The American hotel is the home of the American citizen when he is traveling, and the percentage of Americans who do not travel at some time or other in their lives is very small. The most successful hotel man, I believe, is he who is most expert in managing to make his guests forget that they are not in their own homes, and he does so by placing within the reach and within the command of his guests those comforts which they are accustomed to and desire to have within the privacy of their own four walls. I believe that 90, if not 95 or 99, per cent of the hotels of the country supply wines, beers, and other liquors to their guests, and I presume that they do not do so with the purely malicious intention of causing them to yield to a temptation which they are yearning and praying to escape from, but in order to meet a genuine and spontaneous demand on their part.

"Some of you, I believe, have already gone on record in protesting against the proposed amendment of the Constitution providing for Nation-wide prohibition of the manufacture, sale, and importation of alcohol beverages. I now suggest that you follow up this action by asking your guests, in whose behalf I presume it was taken, to either sustain or repudiate it. In other words, it is in your power, as it is in no one else's power, to let the Congress of the United States know just exactly what the people of the United States think of these prohibition amendments by asking your guests to express themselves either for or against them.

"You can do this by placing in the letter file of each of your guests, on any given day or within any given period, a printed form of petition to Congress, setting forth the fact that certain resolutions providing for Nation-wide prohibition are now pending in the Congress; that the hotels of the country are interested to learn the attitude of their patrons toward such resolutions; and that each guest is therefore requested to sign said petition either for or against their passage and deliver it to the hotel management for transmission to Congress.

"This will be tantamount to a representative poll of the people of the country on a question which the Congress is to-day considering without having any means of ascertaining the true sentiment of the voters with regard to it.

"I am fully alive to the fact that this can not be done without careful preparation, and that it should not be done without providing the strictest possible safeguards that will secure an unquestionably fair and impartial expression of public opinion. The arrangements for carrying it out should therefore be placed in the hands of a committee, with power to appoint subcommittees in every State, whose duty it will be to supervise all details connected with this poll and to settle all questions that may arise concerning it.

"I am authorized by the National Association of Commerce and Labor, consisting of a large number of merchants' and manufacturers' associations throughout the country, all of whose members, representing many thousands of firms, are actively interested in this question, to offer the assistance and cooperation of that association in the execution of this work, and to place its every extensive organization at your disposal for the purpose of perfecting and carrying it out in all its details; and if it should be your pleasure to adopt my suggestion, I would ask that you empower your committee to act in conjunction with that association and avail itself of the facilities it offers in putting the proposed plan in operation.

"I suggest, furthermore, that your committee be empowered to place itself in communication with all the clubs of the country and invite them to cooperate with you in this work by taking a similar poll of their own members.

"Gentlemen, I urge this action upon you regardless of whether you are individually believers in prohibition or not, and I do so not for your sake, but for the sake of those whom you serve, and whose voice in such a matter none but they who hold the principle of democratic government in contempt can presume to disregard.

"Many of us may differ individually on the question of what measure of personal freedom is best calculated to promote the welfare of the community at large, but whether one of us believes that a maximum of such freedom and another believes that a minimum of such freedom is most beneficial is a matter of no moment at all. It is the will of the people that governs the Government of this country, and it is upon the will of the people that the surrender or the nonsurrender of their individual rights and liberties depends. Indeed, the success or the failure of all laws in a Commonwealth like ours hinges upon the correct interpretation of the people's will on the part of those who make those laws, for what we rather grandiloquently term the majesty of the law is not conferred upon laws by those who make them nor by those who execute them, but by the mass of the people, who accept them, approve them, and ratify them.

"If the mass of the people, whose collective wisdom is superior to the wisdom of any legislative body conceivable, would take as determined an attitude toward the laws of the land before they are enacted as it does toward the laws of the land after they are enacted, many of the troubles from which our Republic is to-day suffering would be eliminated. It lies in this case with you to become the instrument through which the Nation at large can unequivocally define its real attitude toward a measure which, if enacted, will constitute the most radical departure in the government of men since the days of the ancient patriarchs.

"If you consent to become that instrument, you will perform not only a service to yourselves and to your clients, but a patriotic service to the country at large; you will earn not only the recognition of the people to whose views you thus give the means of utterance, but also the gratitude of the people's representatives, the faithful performance of whose duty to the Nation is conditioned upon a correct knowledge of those views. And, above all, you will discharge a duty clearly imposed upon yourselves as the Nation's housekeepers, namely, to see that, if a change is to be made in the order of the Nation's household, it be made with the full knowledge and consent of the householders themselves and not at the mere dictation of a factional body of citizens who represent themselves as the accredited spokesmen of those householders.

"Gentlemen, I ask you to give this matter the earnest and urgent consideration it deserves. Your ability to carry it out is beyond question. To believe that the will to do so is lacking in you would mean to doubt the judgment, the loyalty, and the patriotism of men who represent one of the greatest and most magnificent institutions of this country—the American hotel."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, my present purpose is to support the bill under consideration. However, that is not my purpose in taking the floor this morning. My purpose is to submit some few observations in response to remarks made by the minority leader, Mr. MANN, a few days ago, and this is the first opportunity I have found to do so. I regret the gentleman is not on the floor, because when I make remarks concerning a fellow Member I am always glad to have him hear those remarks.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit a question or observation right here?

Mr. DOUGHTON. A short one.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does not the gentleman think, in order to be courteous, he ought to wait until the minority leader is present?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know whether I can get an opportunity when he is present. If I can be sure of the time, I will be glad to wait. I have waited now three or four weeks to get an opportunity. I was denied unanimous consent by a Member on that side of the House who has burdened the RECORD with as much superfluous talk as any man here.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman has undoubtedly heard that the presence of a majority has a tendency to prevent abuses. Now, does not the gentleman think the point of no quorum ought to be made, so that we can bring them in here to attend to their business? Every leader on that side is absent.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am not willing to discuss what ought to be done in that regard.

Mr. ADAMSON. I resent the suggestion made by the gentleman from Connecticut, because the gentleman from Connecticut and I are both here. There are two leaders here.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had the floor, I rose and addressed the Chair and asked if the gentleman would yield. I thought then, and still think, I was within my rights. In declining, the gentleman from Illinois was clearly within his rights, and had he proceeded with the discussion it would have been perfectly all right and I would have thought nothing more of it; but after declining in rather an uncivil way, he attempted to reproach me by stating in a very sarcastic, snarling, and disrespectful manner that I could not answer if given a week in which to do so.

I had not requested to be allowed to answer anything, neither was that my purpose when I rose. If that had been my motive, I would have taken the floor in my own right. My purpose in interrupting the gentleman was to ask him a question relating to the subject under consideration.

I shall not attempt to reply to him in the manner in which he referred to me, and, so far as I am concerned, he can continue to hold his monopoly on that kind of debate.

When my term of office in this House shall have ended I will at least have the satisfaction of feeling and knowing that I have extended to each and every one of my colleagues that courtesy and consideration to which he is entitled. [Applause.]

We all recognize the gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader, as an able, faithful, untiring Member of this body. We also realize that in parliamentary matters he has no superior. One in his position who can and ordinarily does large things in a large way should be incapable of doing small things in a small way.

The gentleman specially requested that some one take time and answer why the tariff was taken off of wool, if by so doing it has resulted in increasing the price of foreign wool. So far as I can find, the RECORD discloses no such statement made by anyone on this side of the House. The statement has been made on this side and admitted on that side that the price of domestic wool is from 3 to 5 cents per pound higher this year, under the present tariff law, than last year, under the old Payne-Aldrich tariff law. Whether or not the change in the tariff has brought about this condition I am unable to state.

We all know, however, had the price declined it would have been charged up to the tariff. I will state to the gentlemen on that side of the aisle that we did not take the tariff off of wool and reduce it on the manufactures of wool and woolens for the purpose of increasing the price of domestic or foreign wool, though some thought that such would be the result. They believed that it would break up the Wool Trust that had hitherto fixed the price of raw and manufactured wool and restore competition in buying wool, and thereby increase the price.

I for one at the time had some fears that reducing the tariff might affect or lower the price of wool, and believing also that a reasonable revenue duty was necessary, opposed in conference the placing of wool on the free list. The tariff was taken off of wool and reduced on woolens in order to give cheaper clothing, blankets, and so forth, to the American people, as everyone knows save the gentleman from Illinois.

While that bill was under discussion we all remember how wails and lamentations went up from that side of the House to an altitude hitherto unknown as to its direful effects on the wool-growing and sheep-raising industry of the country. The eloquent appeals of the gentlemen from Ohio, Mr. Longworth, Mr. WILLIS, and others, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], of how a great American industry was about to be destroyed, are still ringing in our ears. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said that we were striking down one American industry after another, and the able and eloquent gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] said that the bill was framed by men who wanted to increase the flocks of Australia, South America, and South Africa and drive the flocks of the United States to the slaughterhouse.

From their statements one would have thought that within a brief period after the enactment of this law that the only sheep to be found in the United States would be in the zoo, and it would be as great a curiosity as Roosevelt's zebra. We would have thought that every sheep in Australia, Canada, South America, and from the ends of the earth, regardless of transportation charges, long distance, high mountains, or deep water, would have immediately been dumped on our markets, and that wool from these countries would have become as plentiful and as cheap as the leaves of the forest. Frantic statements are worthless, however, when superseded by facts, and the facts are that none of these dire prophecies have been fulfilled.

The gentlemen on that side who are so fond of congesting the RECORD with letters telling of damage done and injury wrought as the result of our tariff bill, it is superlatively strange now that they are not placing in the RECORD some of the letters from the woolgrowers and sheep raisers of the country as to the ruinous effects of this law, as predicted by them 12 months ago.

While the woolgrower is getting from 3 to 5 cents per pound more, as I have stated, for his wool this year than he did last, the American people are buying clothing of the grade worn by the plain people, I am reliably informed, materially cheaper than under the old tariff law. That was our purpose, and the result is our justification.

I am a farmer and a sheep raiser on a small scale myself and know that wool was sold last year in my country from 20 to 22 cents per pound. This year it brought 24 to 25 cents.

A few days ago I addressed a letter to the Chatham Manufacturing Co., Elkin, N. C., asking them to give me the prices they have paid for wool for the last 8 or 10 years. These people are large buyers of raw wool, also large manufacturers of woolen blankets and other woolen fabrics. They gave me the following quotations:

	Cents.
1906	28
1907	25
1908	21
1909	30
1910	23
1911	21
1912	28
1913	21
1914 (for unwashed wool)	25–26

Signed by Chatham Manufacturing Co.

The highest being 30 cents in 1909, and the lowest being 21 cents in 1908, 1911, and 1913, respectively. So a comparison of these figures shows that this year, under the new tariff law, with every effort made to break down the price, it is one-third of a cent higher than the average for the nine years given, the average for the nine years being 24⅔ cents. These figures are based on actual cash transactions, and controvert every statement by our opponents as to what would be the result of our tariff law on the price of wool.

These facts call for no answer from us, and need no explanation on this side of the House. They do, however, call for an explanation from those of you who filled the RECORD full of false statements as to the ruinous effects of the tariff law on the sheep and wool industry.

For 20 years the Republican Party has had but one issue, and that has been calamity howling, but you have at last overplayed the game, and your efforts are so transparent that the wayfaring man, even though a fool, can easily comprehend them.

You persist in talking about the great army of the unemployed, but outside of a very few corporation-ridden States and communities, where the people are being oppressed for political effect, business conditions were never better.

There are only two armies of the unemployed—one is the army of Republican lame ducks, and the other is the army of hobos. Neither was ever known to do anything but howl calamity. For every idle man who is found without a job in the towns and cities, and who really wants to work, there are hundreds of calls for help out on the farms. Men who are willing to go on the farms and work can find employment on every hand at a larger wage than ever before in the history of the country.

The people of the section of the country from which I hail are prosperous, contented, and happy, and you had just as well attempt to suspend the law of gravitation or turn back the tides of the ocean as to undertake to frighten them any longer by the false cry of business depression. Notwithstanding the fact that they had been told again and again that if the Democratic Party was successful the price of cotton, wheat, tobacco, corn, and cattle would go to nothing they know that they sold these commodities for a larger price in the year 1913 than ever before.

Bank statements show more money on deposit than ever before, factories are being enlarged, new enterprises starting up daily, and there is every evidence that business conditions are on a substantial basis.

Constructive statesmanship is one thing and destructive criticism is another. You are conspicuous failures at the former, but a prodigious success at the latter. Your whole program throughout this entire Congress has been one of criticism, grumbling, and complaint. While we enacted the tariff law, currency law, gave the people the parcel post, provided for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, imposed an income tax on the wealth of the country, and are now completing the program by the enactment of trust legislation, the only assistance you have offered has been to stand by and curse the doctor and choke the patient. The masses of American people of all parties are honest, and such dope, claptrap, rot, and rubbish as you have been handing out no longer appeal to their intelligence.

At the end of this Congress we will have enacted more progressive, constructive, and remedial legislation for the relief and benefit of the great masses of the American people than any Congress that has convened in Washington in half a century. While it is known of all men that the program of your leaders has been one of constant and continuous obstruction, yet you have not only failed to offer any program of relief, but you have been unable to marshal your entire forces against any of the measures we have passed.

When our labors are ended we are entirely willing to have judgment passed upon us, and a verdict rendered as to the way in which we have kept the faith, and the manner in which we have fought the battles for the people. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] six minutes.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, the people of the district which I have the honor to represent are greatly interested in the immediate passage of this bill or a measure of similar purport. We have on the Connecticut River, about 12 miles above Hartford, at what are known as the Enfield Rapids, 30,000 horsepower running to waste every day, although it is situated in the center of a manufacturing section, where within the radius of a few miles there are over 100,000 horsepower being manufactured by the use of coal at comparatively high cost to the manufacturers.

By the development of this water power electricity can be delivered to the manufacturing plants in small communities at about one-half of the cost to them of producing steam power. The development of this water power has been delayed and prevented by the failure of Congress to solve the water-power problem, so far as navigable rivers are concerned, which the present bill will and does solve, and will permit the utilization of these water powers now being wasted, and will at the same time greatly aid the development of our rivers for navigation, with the expense of this development borne by private capital rather than by the Government.

The State of Connecticut has already granted authority for the development of this power, and in Connecticut the State owns the bed of the river. Over six years ago the legislature of that State passed a special act permitting the damming of the Connecticut River at Windsor Locks, and, in so far as it could, made the necessary grant to permit the conservation of this great natural resource of the State.

The capital necessary to develop this project, which it is estimated will cost at least $5,000,000, I am informed is ready and waiting. I am assured that a company of over 70 Connecticut and western Massachusetts men has been organized who are anxious to see this development made, and who are willing and ready to invest their own money in this project and are simply waiting for permission from the United States Government to go ahead with it. This company is made up of manufacturers, who want the cheap power for their own individual plants; of men interested in the improvement of navigation, who are ready to invest their money in this project in order that navigation on the Connecticut River may be opened up from Hartford to Holyoke and the advantages of cheap water transportation gained for the manufacturing cities and towns which have been built up along the Connecticut River.

The only thing which prevents the immediate development of this project is the failure to secure authority from Congress for the right to place a dam across the Enfield Rapids. There is no navigation on this river to-day above Hartford on account of these rapids. The Government has refused to improve the river, owing to the expense of placing a dam across it in order to enable boats to surmount these rapids. It has, after a very careful and complete examination, recommended the improvement of this river, contingent upon a dam being built by private capital at Windsor Locks.

The passage of this bill will go a long way toward permitting this improvement to be made, and is a preliminary step which is absolutely necessary before these developments can be started.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONERGAN. I can not yield. I have not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LONERGAN. Under the terms of the present general dam act it has been impracticable to secure capital for the development of these water-power projects.

This water-power controversy has been one of long standing. The real purpose of the present bill and the real solution of the problem is to serve the public interest; to safeguard the people against any overcharge for power; to prevent illegal combinations in restraint of trade and at the same time to permit and encourage the investment of capital in the development of water-power projects in order that the vast amount of hydroelectric power now being wasted in this country can be immediately utilized. From every part of the country there is an insistent demand for electric power. This call comes from the city and from the country, from factory and from farm, from the manufacturing centers of the East, from the arid lands of the West, and from the new industrial cities of the South. More and cheaper electric power is demanded for lighting our houses and streets, for cooking our food, for use in our factories, for moving our railroads now operated by steam, and for street railways and for interurban lines, for pumping water for irrigation and to drain the overabundantly watered lands of the South.

Cheap electric power is demanded that this country may be on an industrial footing equal to that of the nations of Europe, where, it must be admitted, the development of the new electric chemical industries is far in advance of this country. The present laws have caused what is practically a deadlock between capital and the Government in the development of water powers upon all rivers under the control of the United States. Grants permitted under the terms of the present laws are not such as to encourage the investment of capital in water-power projects. The result is a complete stagnation of water-power developments. The few plants that have been constructed have either been exceptionally favored in their situation or have become bankrupt.

In the attempt to protect the interests of the public preventive measures have been passed, so that the public has been deprived of the great benefits to be secured from the full and adequate development of the water powers of this country. What is needed to-day is a constructive program rather than a destructive one, legislation which will permit and encourage the development of navigation and hydroelectric plants to the utmost, yet at the same time safeguard the people against extortion by high prices for power and combinations to prevent the full development and use of these powers. It is just as important to secure for the public the benefits to be derived from the development of these waterways as it is to protect them against high prices and illegal combinations.

All legislation should be in the public interest, but it is not in the public interest to pass laws which prevent utilization of the greatest natural resources of this country.

It is now time to pass constructive legislation which will enable the development of these water powers on terms fair to the public and to private capital.

It is a mistaken policy to prevent the present development of water powers in the belief that in the future they will be more valuable than now and a large source of income to the United States Government, to be raised through the taxation of these water powers. All taxation must be uniform. Every tax laid on water powers must be paid by the consumers of the power and means a higher price for power to those consumers. The correct policy is to encourage the development of our water powers and to protect the consumers by provisions which will prevent extortionate charges for water power, or a too high rate of return, or a more than a reasonable return to capital, a policy which will result in both protecting capital against confiscations and the consumer against extortionate rates. The pending bill, with proposed committee amendments, is a measure—not perfect, to be sure—which guarantees good service, low rates, and fair treatment of the public. These benefits are guaranteed by Government authority, as they should be, without, on the other hand, the threat of property destruction or confiscation.

The bill establishes the public rights by a specific provision that if any State shall fail to provide laws for the regulation of these matters, then regulation shall be exercised by the Secretary of War. Interstate business is, of course, finally to be regulated by the Federal Government. The control is made more complete by the provision that no transfer or assignment of any property or project shall be made without the approval of the Secretary of War.

With respect to the preservation and the promotion of navigation, the bill makes ample provisions. No consent may be granted except by approval of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers after plans have been submitted and changed or modified so that they are satisfactory from the standpoint of both power and navigation. The bill in this respect is a great advance over all previous acts or proposals, for it provides that not only shall any plans be such as shall be best adapted to conserve the navigation and power resources of the stream on which the works are to be located, but the scope is broadened to cover, in a comprehensive way, such neighboring streams and general conditions in the region as may exert a modifying or controlling influence on the water power and navigation resources.

All other provisions, such as the control of the works in the paramount interest of navigation, the relief of the Government from liability for damages to private property, the furnishing of power free of charge for lock operation, and the conveyance, free of cost, to the Government by the grantee of land necessary for locks and approaches are all reserved in the bill.

The bill defines and fixes the tenure of the grant and the conditions under which it may be terminated.

The principal reason why the general dam act has placed an embargo on water-power development is that it confers on the grantee no title that can be made a basis for financing. The longest term provided is 50 years, and there is no provision for disposition of the property or the recovery of equivalent value by the grantee at the end of that period.

It is stated that as a result the investment of at least a half billion dollars of capital has been prevented that would otherwise have been invested in water-power projects, and we have deprived ourselves of enormous electrochemical industries, such as have been so successful in Europe.

Under the terms of this bill the Government can not grant consent in perpetuity but for an initial period of 50 years, after which the Government reserves the right to terminate upon paying the fair value of the investment, not including any value of the rights granted. Until the Government decides to exercise this right, after the expiration of the 50-year period, the grant may be continued or terminated under the provisions of sections 9 and 10. This is a fair and businesslike provision. It fulfills every reasonable condition as to the public interest in the tenure of the grant, and at the same time provides a tenure that can be used as a basis of sound credit for the purpose of borrowing money for development purposes.

The regulation of rates and service is provided for in this bill, granting double security to the public interest. Regulation is properly left in the first instance to the local sovereign, but in case the State should fail to adequately provide for such regulation the duty falls on the Secretary of War.

I do not think our waterways should be left to the exploitation of private interests, but favor a program fair to all concerned. It is probable that in another generation or two the Government will own all water powers, but in the meantime they should be utilized under Government control.

The development of the water power at Windsor Locks is a matter which concerns all of the towns situated near that place. This is a manufacturing as well as an agricultural part of the State of Connecticut. The communities which will be directly interested and their population in 1910 follow:

Hartford	98,915
New Britain	43,916
East Hartford	8,138
Windsor	4,178
South Windsor	2,251
East Windsor	3,362
Windsor Locks	3,715
Suffield	3,841
Enfield	9,719
Rockville	9,087
Manchester	13,641
Stafford Springs	5,235
Glastonbury	4,796

Every one of these communities is in direct line for the benefits which would result from the developing of the water power at this part of the river. These cities and towns are among the most prosperous as well as the oldest in the State. Among their residents are thousands of people who are engaged in manufacturing and agricultural pursuits, and whose products go beyond the border of the United States. There are hundreds of prosperous mercantile and manufacturing concerns and hundreds of thousands of consumers who will indirectly feel the benefit of a substantial movement to increase the manufacturing facilities in their respective localities. Not only the places I have mentioned, but several other important towns and cities in Connecticut and Massachusetts will be accommodated by the proposed improvements on the Connecticut River. There is no question but that with the increased population and continued industrial development the demand for water power is growing rapidly. It would be difficult to estimate the great advantages to the industries of northern Connecticut which are bound to follow when the proposed project opens up this new source of power.

The firm belief in the ultimate success of the project is greatly strengthened by the personnel of those who are back of the enterprise. They are substantial men of affairs who have achieved marked success in other lines and who are identified with the largest commercial and manufacturing interests in their respective towns, and it may be expected that they will bring to this important undertaking the same ability, enterprise, fair dealing, and judgment that have characterized their endeavors in the past.

The Connecticut Valley is anxious to make the most of the natural resources of the Connecticut River. In my speech in the House of Representatives, on March 21 last, I mentioned the reasons for the widespread desire for the improvement of the Connecticut River. The Connecticut rises in the extreme northern portion of New Hampshire and flows in a southerly direction between that State and Vermont, forming the boundary line between these two States, and through Massachusetts and Connecticut, emptying into Long Island Sound and Saybrook, about 30 miles to the eastward of New Haven and about 40 miles to the westward of New London. Its entire watershed is said to be about 11,000 square miles, of which only about 850 square miles are below Hartford. Most of the important tributaries of the Connecticut River join it above Hartford. Below Hartford there are only five that may be considered of any importance. The Park or Hog River enters the Connecticut from the westward at Hartford about 4,100 feet below the highway bridge, and the Hockanum River flows into it from the eastward about 5,000 feet below the mouth of the Park River. At Middletown, Little River flows in from the westward; and just above East Haddam the Salmon River and a short distance above Essex Eight Mile River empty in from the eastward.

An idea of the possibilities in freight traffic development on the Connecticut River is given in an extract from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army made public recently. The report showed that the value of freight transported on the river during 1912 was $39,419,594.70. The tonnage was 617,981 short tons, mainly coal, lumber, building materials, fertilizer, petroleum products, and miscellaneous steamboat freight.

The Boston Chamber of Commerce in a recent report showed that the annual freight bill of New England on coal alone was $70,000,000. The actual value of this coal at the mines was but $30,000,000. Hence it costs more than $2 to bring every dollar's worth of coal into New England, according to the Boston Chamber of Commerce. How long can New England expect to do business under this handicap and still keep up its competition with an aggressive interior and a booming West, so much more favorably situated with regard to the fuel supply and the market?

An idea of the large number of people who are in position to be benefited by the development of the river is given by referring to the population of the cities and towns concerned. The communities in Connecticut interested in the river improvements have approximately 600,000 inhabitants. They are in the front rank among New England's manufacturing towns, and their products, which are so diversified that they range all the way from an ordinary pin to an automobile are shipped to all sections of the civilized world.

Historical records show that a hundred or more years ago elaborate plans were commenced for the development of the Connecticut River. A system of canals was proposed, and charters were secured in Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. Under the Connecticut charter, which was granted in 1824, the recipient was given permission to widen the channel of the river and remove obstructions from that part of the river between the bridge at Hartford and the city of Springfield. Authority to construct canals was also given. Extensive improvements were made at that time, and it is said that at that period the Connecticut River entered upon its era of greatest commercial activity. According to the records, the whole river was open to navigation from Hartford, Conn., to Wells River, Vt. The river is about 345 miles long. Freight was carried in flatboats with capacity of 30 to 40 tons.

Several bills have been introduced in this session of Congress having for their purpose the development of the Connecticut River. House bill 7592, introduced August 22, 1913, calls for an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for improving the river from Long Island Sound to Hartford, with a view to securing a channel of width and depth suitable to accommodate the present and future demands of commerce.

House bill 27989, introduced January 13, 1913, proposed the authorization of the relocating and constructing of a dam across the Connecticut River above Windsor Locks, and for other purposes.

House bill 6437, introduced June 26, 1913, called for an appropriation of $1,015,000 for the improvement of the river between Hartford and Holyoke, Mass., including the deepening of the channel.

HELP TOBACCO IRRIGATION.

The Connecticut Valley is famous for its tobacco lands, the river extending right through the heart of the tobacco belt. One of the problems which confronts the tobacco grower at the present time is the question of irrigation. Many growers and the United States Department of Agriculture are giving the matter serious study, and a partial solution is near at hand. Millions of gallons of water will be required in the irrigating, and power development on the Connecticut River, it is believed, will open up for the growers a new means for supplying the much needed water in the thirsty tobacco fields.

THE PEOPLE DESIRE IT.

The citizens of the towns which border the Connecticut River, not only in their own interest but in behalf of the commercial prosperity of the whole State, desire legislative action which will make possible the utilization to the fullest extent of the great natural resources of the river for power purposes and navigation. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, on many occasions I have stood upon this floor and attempted to call attention to the many advantages of the State of Florida, the progressiveness of her people, her great industries, and all that sort of thing; and I want to call attention this morning to some figures which I think will carry confirmation strong as holy writ. In the individual payment of income taxes in proportion to population Florida leads all Southern States. The following article from the Pensacola News shows the amount paid in the States of Louisiana, Texas, Georgia, Florida, Virginia, Alabama, and Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Arkansas, and South Carolina.

INCOME TAX PAYMENTS IN FLORIDA.

In the individual payments of income tax in proportion to population Florida leads all southern States. The following table shows the collection of tax on individual incomes for the Southern States, the population of the States, and the amount of individual income tax paid by each per thousand population:

State.	Income tax.	Population.	Amount per 1,000.
Texas	$361,965.21	3,896,542	$92.89
Louisiana	159,056.91	1,656,388	96.02
Georgia	115,874.11	2,609,121	40.58
Florida	108,800.43	751,139	144.85
Virginia	102,638.04	2,061,612	49.70
Alabama and Mississippi	102,586.10	3,935,207	26.07
Tennessee	98,277.59	2,184,789	44.98
Kentucky	98,244.66	2,289,905	42.90
West Virginia	94,627.97	1,221,119	77.49
Oklahoma	93,082.15	1,657,115	56.17
North Carolina	46,566.55	2,206,287	21.11
Arkansas	41,239.25	1,574,449	26.19
South Carolina	25,816.08	1,515,400	17.57
Total	1,448,775.05	27,559,108	52.57

This is a splendid indication of Florida prosperity, the State's per capita payment of this tax being 50 per cent greater than that of Texas or Louisiana, almost double that of Virginia, more than three times as much as that of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Georgia, more than four times as great as that of Arkansas, Alabama, and Mississippi, nearly seven times as great as that of North Carolina, and more than eight times as great as that of South Carolina.

Though its population is less than that of any other Southern State, Florida is fourth in individual payments of income tax. When the payments are figured in proportion to population the State of Florida pays approximately three times as much tax on incomes as the balance of the South. It would be well for all boosters to paste these figures in their hats.

It will be seen that Florida, which pays $144.85 per thousand of population, leads all this list. I have called attention to these facts, Mr. Chairman, in order that "he who runs may read," and that all the people of these United States may know that the arms of the State of Florida are open. We have plenty of territory. Anyone can be paying an income tax hereafter to support the Government if he will only migrate from some of these other States to the State of Florida. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota kindly use some of his time?

Mr. ESCH. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I beg the attention of the Members on the floor to a discussion of a subject that I hope will not be regarded as captious criticism, but probably constructive criticism. I am sure those who are here will give me the recognition that this is the first time I have spoken under general debate when I have not spoken to the bill, and I would not speak afield of the bill to-day if it were not to ask the respectful attention of the membership to a theory of government that we all, as students of our history and members of one of the legislative bodies, ought to look into a little more carefully than we have.

I think this is probably the first time in the history of our Nation when the distinguished head of the Nation has had an opportunity of putting into operation a theory of government that he himself has outlined in the form of lectures and published treatises upon constitutional government. For that reason I take it that it is not a matter of impulse, but it is rather a matter of constructive judgment upon his part. I refer to the relationship between the three departments of the Government; and if I should say anything that would appear to be criticism, I want it distinctly understood that it is said with the highest personal regard for the head of the Nation, as every Member in this House knows I have.

I think that Macaulay in his comments makes an error in referring to our own Government when he says the United States Government has not anything in it that it did not bodily borrow from the English House of Commons. This statement from the famous English essayist was an argument that the new Government was but a copy of the old. Thomas Jefferson, so far as I know, was the first man to put in writing words clearly differentiating our Government from the Governments of Europe or any other Government anywhere of a constitutional character. He wrote to James Madison in 1786 to this effect, that the executive department must be contradistinguished from the legislative department and the judicial department, and that the three departments must be jealously kept separated. And this ideal prevailed, as you know, in the Constitutional Convention that was held a year after this famous letter. However the great leaders of that body differed in other respects, in this they were agreed.

Almost every English commentator upon constitutional law, including such men as Edward A. Freeman, then occupying the chair of modern history in Oxford University; James Anthony Froude; Goldwin Smith; Justin McCarthy; and that famous writer, Henry Thomas Buckle—all of these English publicists claim that the one differentiation between our Government and others is the jealousy with which the three departments are being kept separated. I mention this to indicate to you that modern thought in Europe is in accordance with the form of government as set forth by the constitutional fathers in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. In that convention we had the three departments set out, each one organized independently, each one independent in its function, and neither dependent upon the others; and I am sure that every Member of this House will recognize that that has been maintained pretty jealously up to at least a certain period. True, emergencies like war compel a President to extend his functions, as in the case of Lincoln. I want to call the attention of the membership of the House to what I regard as a modification of that theory, of the loss of equilibrium of the coordinate departments of government; and I do it not alone because of what has been done, but also because of what has been said by the President of the United States before he had become the Nation's head, but while he was the head of a great university.

I refer to a series of lectures that he delivered in Columbia University in 1908, which since have been printed by the university authorities. I hope that you will note:

> The President is at liberty, both in law and in conscience, to be as big a man as he can. His capacity will set the limit. If Congress be overborne by him, it will be no fault of the makers of the Constitution.

This statement has deep significance to me:

> If Congress be overborne by him, it will be no fault of the makers of the Constitution. It will be from no lack of constitutional power on the part of the President, but only because the President has the Nation behind him, and Congress has not the Nation behind it.

I read further, on page 71:

> The personal force of the President is perfectly constitutional to any extent to which he chooses to exercise it, and it is by the clear logic of our constitutional practice that he has become alike the leader of his party and the leader of the Nation.

I read further, on page 72, the most significant statement in this strikingly significant address. Note it:

> The lawmaking part of the Government ought certainly to be very hospitable to the suggestions of the planning and the acting part of the Government.

What is the "planning" part of the Government? What is the "acting" part of the Government as interpreted in this sentence? The President of the Nation asks that the legislative or the lawmaking power be responsive to what? To the "acting" and the "planning" part of the Government. And then, in another sentence he says there are those who think that Pennsylvania Avenue ought still to be longer and that the White House should be further separated from Capitol Hill.

I want to repeat that this is not said in the sense of captious criticism, but it is as a Member of the House calling attention to a political theory that is now being inaugurated in the Government, not from impulse, not as an emergency, but as a political theory well defined by its author before he was seriously mentioned as President. I do not believe that anyone can feel that I am not justified in calling attention to it on the ground that some one would criticize me and say, "You are doing this purely for political purposes." That is not true. Here is an announcement of a new theory unknown to our views in the past. All Governments, whether they be European or American, are the same in organization. Every Government must maintain certain functions—the lawmaking, the law-enforcing, and the law-interpreting departments of government. Ours is not different from the Government of Turkey in its powers or in its exercise of function. All Governments exercise these three departments. Some place all three in one, as until recently was done by Turkey. The executive absorbed the other two, and it was a despotism. In England, while the executive is recognized with veto power in the abstract right, he has not used it since 1701. All power there is with the legislative, and with but one branch of it. Not so with us.

As said Mr. Bryce in that famous work on the American Commonwealth, ours is different from any other country, in that you maintain the legislative, executive, and judicial departments all separate, one from the other. It is true they are interdependent in some respects, but in the exercise of their functions neither depends upon the other. This is our signal virtue. When you put functions like the legislative and judicial and executive in one man's hands, then you have despotism like Turkey. I do not mean that that is being done in this country, but I do mean the tendency is in the direction of increase power of the Executive. This is natural; but in the present case it is more significant, because it follows a theory of the present Executive, as set out in 1908.

Mr. GORDON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the Constitution of the United States by express terms make the President a part of the lawmaking function?

Mr. FESS. The Constitution of the United States by express terms defines the functions of the Executive, first, that he shall see that the laws of the United States are enforced; secondly, that he, in conjunction with the Senate, shall have the appointing power; thirdly, that he shall have the function of making treaties, to be confirmed by the Senate; and, fourthly, the only legislative function he has is a negative one, namely, the veto power. There is no positive one. He can on the state of the Union give the conditions of the country in a message if he wants to, but the House or the Senate is not required to pay more than respectful attention to that. That is not legislation. That is only information upon which Congress can act favorably or unfavorably or entirely ignore. These are the functions of the President.

The President holds that his office is becoming less executive and more political.

The President himself, in this series of lectures, says his constitutional function in lawmaking is a negative force, to say what shall not be done, and not a positive force, to say what shall be done. In his veto the President can say what shall not be done, but two-thirds of the two Houses can overturn that. You make a mistake when you think the legislative department of this Government is at the White House instead of on Capitol Hill. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the thing I am calling attention to.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman has overlooked the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the President at all times during his official incumbency to give advice to Congress.

Mr. FESS. I have just mentioned that; I have said that he could give information in the form of a message, but Congress does not have to pay any attention to it except as a matter of respect. Even in the latter case the Congress is under no legal obligation.

Mr. GORDON. And Congress does not have to pay any attention to what the gentleman from Ohio says.

Mr. FESS. I do not think my friend ought to inject a statement of that kind. I am trying to put the matter on a plane that the gentleman himself will approve. I am not saying this in a sense of captious criticism. I am somewhat surprised that Members fret under a deliberate discussion of such important matters that ought to be above partisan contention and free of personal attack. I want to say again that there should be a well-defined field of operation for each department. As Blackstone says, there must be intelligence to make the laws, good will to interpret the laws, and power to enforce the laws. The making of the law is legislative; the interpreting of the law is judicial; and the enforcement of the law is executive. These three must never be combined. If you do you have lost the one unique feature that we have in our Government which differentiates us from all other countries.

I am saying this as a student of comparative history. Ours, I repeat, is the only country that maintains these three departments absolutely independent in the exercise of function, and yet in a sense interdependent in organization.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman complaining that Congress accepts the advice of the President too frequently?

Mr. FESS. No. Acceptance here means freedom to reject. In that case, I say no.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the fault that we are falling into?

Mr. FESS. I will answer that, although I had not intended to enter that field. My friend from Kentucky asks what is the fault we are falling into. I will specify the fault we are falling into. I do not think it is the function of the President to call a Member from this House to consult him as to what he is going to say on this floor on any particular subject. I do not think it is the function of the President to have any man, whether associated with the Government or not, write a bill and then have it submitted to a partial committee of this House and have that committee exclude the minority Members, and then take it to the Democratic caucus and there put the measure through by caucus rule on the basis that he is the leader of the party as well as the leader of the Nation, as was done in the currency bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not think that is a legitimate function of the Executive—to require a measure submitted to him and have him give orders to place certain articles on the free list to try out his theories. These are some of the things I have in mind, and then there are other things such as we see frequently, but I do not want to enter that, because I will be regarded as being offensive personally, and I do not mean to be. I simply want to call the attention of this House to the encroachment on the legislative field by the Executive, because he believes in that theory as set forth in his written lectures some time ago. This is the thing that is serious. It is not a matter of impulse; it is a matter of political theory in which he believes, and I do not believe it is the theory of this Government. That is why I am calling attention to it.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman take the time to make it more clear what part of the lecture is inconsistent with the gentleman's statement as to what are the functions of the Government? He simply says that if Congress is overborne by the President it is the fault of Congress; in other words, if the President has the power intellectually to persuade through his constitutional right to recommend to this body, what is there in that that is inconsistent with the gentleman's theory of government? In other words, if he is smarter than we are and give good reasons for it, what harm is there in that?

Mr. FESS. I want to say to my friend that when he says if the President is smarter than we are, he really puts the whole thing in a nutshell. The President does not regard this House as the representative responsible to the people, but he believes the President is that responsible head. The executive department is one thing, the legislative department is another. The Executive is one man, the legislative is 435 Representatives and 96 Senators. The legislative department represents a single function that is lawmaking, where in the multitude of counsel there ought to be safety. If its power is to be overborne by not the lawmaker, but the law enforcer, then I say the legislative function has been usurped by the executive function, and I do not believe you think that is a good thing. I am not addressing any particular party in this House, but all parties. The majority side would show their jealousy of their rights were the head of the Nation not of their political faith.

Mr. DECKER. Just one point there. Does the gentleman not mean to infer that it depends upon how it is overborne? If it is overborne by a reason, where can there be any harm in it?

Mr. FESS. Very well, if the gentleman wants to accept it in that way, but this is what I have in mind—the President seeking in the exercise of his function to be so powerful a factor in the Government that two-thirds of this House to-day eat out of his hands, without any protest at all; and I say that that is a calamitous situation. How many Members would have voted for the free-tolls repeal against the plank of the platform if the President had not asked that it be done? That is the question, and is a concrete example of what I mean by executive encroachment upon legislation. Only a few rare specimens were free to take a position against the President, and even when they did they submitted themselves to severe partisan criticism.

It is a very serious thing for a Member on that side of the House to go against the wishes of the President, for the wish, as you know, is equal to a command, and most people will respect the wish as though it were a command. And I say that the President when he comes to the floor of this House to address Congress—not because I dislike the practice, for I rather like it—is assuming not an unconstitutional authority, for he has that, but he is putting into practice his views as expressed in these lectures that his personal influence should be a measure here in Congress. I do not say he comes to have you overborne by him, as he says, but I do say that you are likely to be overborne by him, for whatever purpose he might wish, if you suppliantly submit this membership to vote his will without asking any questions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman says he wishes to be entirely fair?

Mr. FESS. I do, and I believe the House knows I have no other motive.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope he does.

Mr. MANN. Of course he does.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the gentleman know that in the preceding Congress, before President Wilson was nominated and elected, a majority of the Democrats of this House voted exactly the same way upon the tolls question? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. I know this, that a great many of them changed their views and were asked by the President to do so without raising the question of right or wrong.

Mr. GORDON. And did not the gentleman change his?

Mr. FESS. No: I did not. I am not a man that changes with the wind. I do not allow any man or set of men to dictate to me how I shall vote. I vote my principles in spite of what happens without fear or favor.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Did not the gentleman tell me on the Saturday before the tolls question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. Neither gentleman has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes so that the gentleman from Ohio may ask his question.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I can not yield to a question of the kind asked by my friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. All right, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] to give me five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, not desiring to inject anything of that sort into the discussion that ought to be lifted above it, I simply want to call another item to your attention, and that is this—and I would like to have the respectful attention of both sides of this House upon this point.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Putting it upon a broader basis than suggested, I would ask the gentleman this question: Is it not apparent—is it not quite obvious—that the trend of the whole American system, both State and National, is to make the Executive more prominent and effective in our Government; is not that the evolution, as far as we can observe?

Mr. FESS. It is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was not that, for instance, most markedly shown in the administrations of Jackson and Roosevelt, and was it not approved by the people of the country?

Mr. FESS. If I may be permitted, that is a field that I desire to enter at this time. It is the point I raised when I yielded to the distinguished Member from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What I desire to suggest is this: That there are forces, great popular convictions, behind the President, whether right or wrong, that are impelling him—that are impelling every executive in every State in the Union—to do things that the gentleman and I may or may not think belong to that branch of the Government.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been a governor and he ought to know.

Mr. FESS. I want to appeal to the good sense of this House upon this phase of the discussion. It might be true that the trend is greater exercise of power in the Executive. I rather think that is true. It might be true that the President is supported by the people of the country in this regard. I think it is true, but I ask my friend from Virginia, whose judgment I very highly regard——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not mean to pass any opinion upon the matter. I was simply trying to suggest what I thought was the trend of the times, the evolution of politics, if I may use that term.

Mr. FESS. I take it that as the gentleman stated the fact he believed it. As I was about to say, I think the people are rather pleased to find the President lashing Congress. As an instance, I was at a business banquet recently, and one of the most distinguished men in the country made an address, and this is what he said in substance: "The Government is paying Congress $25,000 a day to make laws, and it is costing the country $100,000 a day to unmake the laws that they ought not to make."

That statement was applauded to the echo. Why did business men applaud such a statement? Did it express an opinion? Was such an opinion warranted? Does it mean that the public has lost confidence in its Congress? That sentiment is abroad. I heard another distinguished friend in a jocular manner say that a little boy sat in the gallery with his father. When the Speaker rapped for order and the Chaplain led in prayer the little boy said, "Papa, why do they pray for Congressmen?" The father said, "They do not pray for Congressmen, but the Chaplain comes out and looks at the Congressmen, and then he prays for the country." [Laughter.] That statement was applauded. I have heard men speaking from the public platform about our lawmakers in a way that would produce hatred of our legislators—though, thank God, never from my platform, for I would not allow that kind of thing, at least without a chance to answer—and when they got through the hearers wondered how many crooks there were in the House of Representatives from what had been said. I have heard men who sit upon this floor, Members of this present Congress, charged and attacked by men as though everything they did as legislators was done in order to advantage themselves and without a thought for the public welfare. I have heard at different times from the lips of men of respectability statements made about the two Houses of Congress that would lead the public to think that they ought to have a group of detectives in the House in order to find out who these men are who pretend to be legislating for the interests of the country. Similar statements on similar occasions are made against the judiciary until this department has almost become an issue before the people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. No; I can not. I am sorry, but my time is running.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. I am speaking of this to throw some light upon why it is popular to attack the legislative branch of this Government in either House, or why the President is applauded by the people when he issues his commands. Why is it popular to say unkind things about the membership of this House, which utterances are vociferously applauded? Why is it, when the distinguished occupant of the White House spoke of an insidious lobby that it was given the largest space in all the newspapers, and why do Members of this House, as was done yesterday, speaking upon the work of the committee upon the lobby applaud what has been done? It is not sufficient to say that such utterances are for political advantage. The Democratic side of the House would not feel happy to indicate the only concrete result of that lobby investigation. I do not say that to you to be unkind. You are not responsible for it. But the hue and cry that followed the President's method of attack, to result in this fiasco, is but another item in his desire to control Congress.

The charge of insidious lobby will not be forgotten, but the results will find small space in the press. I came to this House with a deep prejudice against the Speaker of this House because of things that I had heard against him by irresponsible babblers, and to-day, with all the vigor of protest that I can summon, I denounce them, for I think he is one of the most lovable and fair-minded, as well as big-hearted, men I have ever known. [Applause.] And yet all over the country we hear the House of Representatives and the Senate held up as a group of men to be watched; that they are not acting for the sake of the country. That is the reason why the public will applaud the lashing of Congress by any man who has the power. All I want to do, without saying anything unkind of anybody, is to call in question the wisdom, as expressed in these series of lectures, of extending the executive function over the legislative. Let us maintain the three departments independently; let the House of Representatives exercise its own functions; let the Senate concur or reject, and let us concur in or reject what the Senate does, but let us not allow too much influence to be exercised over the field of the legislative department by executive power, and, above all, I appeal to you to avoid the appearance of saying he who differs from us is a crook. Freely grant to the President his legislative right to inform Congress on the state of the Union and sign or veto, as he chooses. If you can not differ without impugning motives, then there is something wrong. Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to the danger as I see it. Power is always aggressive. It is never passive. It is assertive. It encroaches wherever the door opens. No one feature of our Constitution was so jealously guarded as the rights of the legislative and the possible dangers of the executive. The history of government is but a comment upon this fact. While I am not one of those who charge sordid motives to men, I do regard a man's views as expressed in well-thought-out publications as an expression of his theories. Upon that basis I call your attention to the part in legislation taken by our President, for whom I have high personal regard but whose theories I must question. [Applause.] If he wishes to inaugurate a responsible ministry, he must not exercise power without commensurate responsibility. If he commands, he must also submit to be questioned.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is terribly concerned about somebody overturning Congress, and says that he has not an unkind thing to say about anybody or anything; but I think that speech he has just made detracts more from the dignity of this body than any I have ever heard since I have been a Member of this House. Like the buzzard, he befouls his own nest. I am not afraid of executive influence so long as the President of the United States can control the Congress by the power of his reasoning, and he has express authority under the Constitution to do it. The gentleman from Ohio complains that the President makes recommendations, and that the Democrats hold a caucus and they put it over. I heard the gentleman state upon the floor of this House less than two months ago at the time when he was keeping tab on the attendance of the Democratic Members here and pointing out the absenteeism on this side of the House—I heard him say the Republicans did not have to be here, because they were not responsible for legislation in this House, and he ascribed this as a reason for not including Republican absentees in his record. Well, if you are not responsible, gentlemen, what are you complaining about the Democratic caucus for? And he is complaining about free tolls. Well, now, it just so happens that the gentleman can not shake his gory locks at me. I was against free tolls before the President was. I was very happy to follow the President's advice on that question, and that is true of a majority of the men on this side of the House and the RECORD shows it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How about the gentleman from Ohio on free tolls? We voted on that proposition on Tuesday. On the Saturday before he told me on the floor of this House that on the following Monday he was going to make a speech in support of the President on the tolls question. He made his speech, but he made it on the other side; he changed his mind. He had a perfect right to do so.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I want to correct the gentleman. I said that I agreed with the President on the economic proposition, and if I had been here in 1912 I would have voted against free tolls, but I would not vote to submit the matter without submitting it to arbitration, because it was asking more than England asked. That is my statement.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is perfectly right to state his recollection of the conversation with me, and I yielded to him for that purpose, but I say to the gentleman that he did say to me on the Saturday before the vote on the tolls question, which was on Tuesday, that he was going to make a speech the following Monday in support of the President's position on the tolls question. I am not complaining about him changing his mind. He had a perfect right to do so. It is the duty of every Member of this House to change his mind when his reason is convinced.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I do.

Mr. FESS. I want my colleague to understand that the speech to which he refers is in the RECORD, and if he will read it he will see exactly what I said about the economical proposition, but as to the national policy I could not——

Mr. GORDON. I know what the gentleman said in the RECORD and I know what the gentleman said to me.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. POU. Out of five great administrative measures I think the gentleman from Ohio voted for three.

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I can not yield further. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that through the power of reasoning, by his great persuasive powers, the President of the United States has overborne the distinguished gentleman from Ohio. If he has, and the gentleman now regrets it, I am sorry. It appears now that he has voted for three out of five great constructive measures which have passed this House, and which were recommended by the President. Now, if any argument can be adduced in support of giving the President all the power that the Constitution has conferred upon him to communicate from time to time his views to Congress in any way he may see fit, it seems to me that the experience of the gentleman from Ohio vindicates that policy, because he is certainly one of the most intense partisan Republicans upon the floor of this House.

I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I, too, believe in the theory of this Government set forth in the Constitution. I, too, believe in the three distinct departments of this Government—the department which makes the laws, the department which interprets the laws, and the department which enforces the laws. And I believe, in harmony with the Constitution, those departments should be kept separate. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] overlooks an important fact, namely, that the makers of the Constitution did not intend the President of the United States to be a figurehead. They did not intend that he should not have influence in legislation. Otherwise, why should they have given to him two things—the right to recommend to Congress needed legislation and the right to veto any measure passed by Congress?

And I want to call your attention to the fact that, so far as what you read from the lectures of the distinguished head of this Nation, there is nothing in them which is inconsistent with that doctrine. He simply says that if the Congress is overborne by the President, it is the fault of Congress and not the fault of the Constitution.

Of course it was never intended by the Constitution that Congress should be browbeaten or intimidated by the President, but it was intended that he should have a right and a duty to exercise and influence over Congress by reason and by intellectual persuasion. President Wilson has exercised this kind of influence. He has dealt with Congress not as a dictator, but as a "normal individual cooperating with other individuals." His influence has been strong, and for the good of Congress and the people, and it has always been through constitutional channels. Of what unconstitutional act does the gentleman complain?

The President was elected by the people upon a platform of well-defined principles and promises. At the beginning he exercised power, but power granted by the Constitution, and convened Congress in extraordinary session to begin to carry out the promises of the platform on which he and Congress were elected. Did the President "overbear" Congress in the writing of the tariff bill? True, he uttered a protest that started the movement that drove the Mulhall lobby from the corridors of Congress with the lash of public scorn. But that tariff bill itself as it finally became a law was very similar to the one written by the great Ways and Means Committee of the Sixty-second Congress under the leadership of CHAMP CLARK and OSCAR UNDERWOOD.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DECKER. I do.

Mr. FESS. I do not charge that he wrote the tariff bill, but I do state that when the tariff bill was carried to him with the provisions for tariff on wool and tariff on sugar, his wish to have them placed upon the free list was recognized.

Mr. DECKER. It is true that the great Ways and Means Committee submitted the tariff bill to the President and he made suggestions as to certain items; and that is in harmony with the principles of the Constitution, as I will point out to you. If the tariff bill, after it had been passed by Congress, had not been satisfactory to the President of the United States it would have been his duty to veto it. The people of this country placed upon him that responsibility. And then, dare you tell this House and the people of the country that he was "overbearing Congress," because, before it was passed, he made his opinions known to the men who are responsible here for passing the tariff bill.

When the tariff bill had been passed, many good men said let us adjourn and rest on our laurels. Congress had a constitutional right to adjourn, but the President has a constitutional right to reconvene Congress. Was it an encroachment on legislative authority then for him to say, "You have done well, but I recommend that before you adjourn you fulfill another promise and reform the banking and currency laws." And so through the Banking and Currency Committee and in cooperation with the President, we wrote into law the Glass-Owen bill that will give a currency responsive to the needs of commerce, that will take the reserve money from Wall Street, distribute it over the country, prevent panics, and weaken the hold of the Money Trust.

You speak about the tolls question. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asked the question as to how many men would have voted against free tolls if it had not been for the President. I will answer that question by saying that, in my humble opinion, every man who voted for that bill did so, not only because of his faith in the President but also because of one or both of two reasons—first, because "toll exemption" meant the violation of a solemn treaty, and, second, because "toll exemption" meant the violation of a doctrine enunciated by the Democratic Party long before the President was born—the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." [Applause.]

Will the gentleman say that the President has overborne Congress because he has asked us to uphold his hands in the efforts which he and the great Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, have been making, with now admitted hope of success, to save from exploitation, anarchy, and strife the unhappy people of distracted Mexico; in the efforts to save them without losing the lives of thousands of American boys and millions of dollars raised by taxing the toiling millions of this land?

Let us consider the antitrust bills. Long before the President attained national prominence the Democratic Party declared that private monopoly was indefensible. We have repeatedly promised that if intrusted to power we would enact laws, not to destroy honest, legitimate business, however big, but to destroy monopoly and give opportunity for individual enterprise on a basis of equality. Is it an encroachment on the legislative department for the President to recommend that we keep our pledge? I am proud to say that we have followed the recommendations and leadership of the President. In doing so we have not degraded, but we have exalted, the reputation of Congress; because in following him we have not yielded to the suggestions, insinuations, and dictations of the powerful few, as has been done by some Congresses in times past, but we have kept our promises and have been responsive to the wishes and interests of all the people, and to them alone the President and we must answer.

I believe the people will approve our course. In spite of the efforts of some gentlemen in this House, and of some newspapers, to emphasize and even augment business difficulties in some localities, the people realize that these great reforms can not be secured without changes and readjustments that must cause temporary business depression. They want the work finished. They know that we have done and are doing what they told us to do; and they believe that when the work is done there will come an era of prosperity unprecedented, prosperity to the humblest and the highest.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How about Mr. Jones?

Mr. DECKER. "How about Mr. Jones?" I want to say to you, sir, I do not speak for the President of the United States as to his confidence in Mr. Jones. I do not know Mr. Jones personally, but I want to say to you, sir, that I voice the sentiment of the majority of the people of the United States when I say that they have confidence in Woodrow Wilson. I want to say to the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who sits there like the grim-visaged raven croaking "Nevermore, nevermore"—like the bird of evil omen predicting misfortune and despair—I want to say to him that the people have confidence in the man who sits in the White House. They do not believe he is infallible, but they believe he is one on whom "every god does seem to set his seal to give the world assurance of a man." An honest man, who has the heart to feel, the brain to think, and the courage to act. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, far more important than the question of whether this House is overborne by the Executive is the question under consideration in the water-power bills before this House. It is a question on which the Executive can not be charged with overbearing this House, because it is to be decided by every Member on his own knowledge and purpose. The people are more interested in the question of the conservation of the water power of America than they are in the question of whether the traditional checks and balances are being sacredly preserved.

I have in my hand the Philadelphia North American of this morning, which calls attention to the fact that 100 municipalities of the country have formed an alliance for the purpose of fighting utility corporations that have been fattening on the people. The union of these cities was proposed by Mayor Blankenburg, of Philadelphia, and on the list of active officers is the name of Louis G. Brandeis, a stalwart fighter for the people against monopolies. This is only one indication of the widespread recognition of the importance of the question of water power.

The future of America is bound up in the water power of the country. Mechanical power lies at the root of civilization in the twentieth century. Of the raw materials of mechanical power, coal, oil, gas, and falling water, the last is the greatest. Its control in the future will mean the control of industry and transportation, and that means the ability to order the daily life of every American.

It is estimated that the annual fall of rain upon the surface of the United States is about 250,000,000,000,000 feet. In the light of our present knowledge and inventions it is possible to use sufficient of this water to generate 150,000,000 horsepower, or about five times the present mechanical needs of the country. There is immediately available over 30,000,000 horsepower, or sufficient to meet the entire demand for power at present.

Rapid increase in the use of water power is noted, and it is not exaggerating to say that the time is not far distant when every light that illumines street or building, every wheel that turns in mill or mine or on railroad, will depend upon the electricity generated by water power.

Under such conditions the importance of the control of water power can not be magnified, for upon it depends the control of our civilization. It is an empire of power, and those who are supreme in it may determine the weal or woe of the Nation.

The question of control is therefore one of the most important that faces the Nation. Private interests, aware of the possibilities, have already sought to settle the question. They entered, years ago, upon a campaign of exploitation, and their far-flung plans were continental in scope. If permitted to continue in the future as in the past they will effect a monopoly greater and more menacing than any that has been known in the history of mankind. Delay, inaction, neglect is all that is necessary to give these power seekers the mastery of the Nation.

Already they have gone far toward building a water-power monopoly. Ten groups of power interests control 65 per cent of all the developed water power in the country. In 1911 they controlled 3,270,000 horsepower, developed and undeveloped; to-day they control 6,270,000. In other words, the amount of concentration has doubled in the past two years.

But still more eloquent, these great power interests have been securing water-power sites and are holding them for the future. In 1911 the 10 greatest groups had developed 1,821,000 horsepower and held undeveloped 1,450,000 horsepower. Two years later they had developed 2,711,000 horsepower and held undeveloped 3,500,000 horsepower. In the two years these power interests have increased their control of power held undeveloped more than twice as fast as the power developed.

In 1908 the 13 greatest interests controlled 1,800,000 horsepower, developed and undeveloped. In 1913 the 10 greatest groups held 6,270,000 horsepower, developed and undeveloped. During this time the total power developed had increased from 5,400,000 to 7,000,000 horsepower. The concentration in control was to the development of power as 7 is to 1.

This startling tendency to centralization in control has not been due to a "let-alone" policy on the part of States and Nation, for there has been some effort on the part of both to exercise a measure of control over water-power development.

As an instance, the State of Pennsylvania has attempted to exercise some control, but in a manner which missed the fundamental principles involved in dealing with water power. As a result practically all of the water-power rights of Pennsylvania are in the hands of private corporations. Mr. Slattery, of the National Conservation Association, gives the following summary:

Pennsylvania has granted charters to 1,856 water-supply and water-power companies; 969 are in active operation; 133 cities and towns of the State control their own water supply. The balance of the charters—1,623—are owned by corporations; 787 are not operated, now held to prevent competition or for future exploitation. Of the 836 owned by corporations and in operation, the most valuable have been consolidated into 93 merger corporations, with 4 giant monopolies. Water rights in 13 counties of Pennsylvania have been secured by the coal companies on the plea that they needed the water for mining purposes, hiding their real reason—fear of the development of a cheaper power than coal. The Lehigh Valley Railroad and its subsidiary coal company controls 9 incorporated and 22 unincorporated water companies. Pennsylvania has a law to annul all water charters not used and put into actual operation within two years after they are granted. Unfortunately, Pennsylvania has another law which says no charter shall be surrendered and no corporations dissolved until all back taxes owed to the State have been paid. The water companies holding charters for future exploitation say since they never operated they never acquired any assets, and therefore can not pay their taxes. Thanks to this conflict in the law, the State can not take back the 787 charters now being held for future exploitation or to prevent competition.

Half of the State's resources have been grabbed within the last five years, and some of the methods are interesting. A newborn water-power company would leave its swaddling clothes of $1,000 capital the day after the charter was granted to appear the next day grown to the size of a million-dollar company. For instance, the Green Tree Water Co. grew from a corporation of $5,000 in May, 1904, to a corporation of $8,000,000 in August of the same year. A few months afterwards this huge Allegheny corporation was made a subsidiary company of the American Water Powers & Guaranty Co. The South Pittsburg Water Co.'s charter of July 15, 1904, under the guise of supplying water to various towns in Pennsylvania, capital $50,000, developed on August 17, 1904, into a $5,000,000 corporation. This company also a few months later became a subsidiary corporation of the American Water Powers & Guaranty Co.

The state of affairs in Pennsylvania and other States and the dangerous concentration of water-power interests everywhere apparent is due to the failure to recognize the peculiar characteristics of the business of developing water power. It is not an ordinary business, to be dealt with on the ordinary basis of competition. Water power is a natural monopoly. The business of supplying mechanical energy generated from water power depends upon natural resources, whose supply is limited; its product is furnished in connection with the power plant itself, and it is subject to the law of increasing returns—that is, the greater the output the larger the returns.

Thus the business of developing power from falling water meets every condition of a natural monopoly. In such a business competition is not advisable, for it means a waste of energy and increased expense for poorer service. A half dozen water-power plants supplying electrical energy to the same town is an inefficient and recklessly wasteful system. It injures all concerned and benefits none. We do not want competition under such conditions.

It is also true that we can not compel competition under these conditions. All the laws in the world will not prevent combination and concentration in such a business as this. Electrical energy can be transmitted more cheaply from one large plant than from two small plants, for practically the same investment is necessary for the small plant as for the large. When competitors, by uniting, can furnish an increasing output at a cheaper rate no power will keep men in business for gain from combining.

The record of the combination of water companies is therefore a logical one and is to be expected. The advantage of increased gain from combination is always present, and it will always prevail under a system of private ownership of water power.

Monopoly, therefore, is the certain end of water-power development. The only question is shall it be a public monopoly owned and operated for the people or shall it be a private monopoly, with the gains going into the coffers of private corporations and the tax-levying power in private hands.

For my part, I believe water power to be the possession of all the people. I want to see it a monopoly, but one owned by the people, with all the rights of control which go with absolute ownership. Natural monopolies make the field for public activity and competitive pursuits are those for private efforts. Water-power sites should never be permitted to pass out of the people's hands. Where public development is not desirable the sites should be leased for definite periods to private enterprises, but at the expiration of such leases all rights should revert to the public.

This ownership of water-power sites is essential to efficient control of developing companies. With such ownership rates can be enforced, which means that some of the profits due to a public grant shall be shared with the people who grant it.

The question as to whether the jurisdiction over water power should be in the States or in the Federal Government is one which has aroused bitter controversy. It is fair to say that, while everyone who favors State control is not an ally of the power grabber, every power grabber and privilege seeker is in favor of State control.

This question should be settled from the standpoint of the welfare and interests of all the people. That demands that the water power shall be nationalized, that the Federal Government shall have supreme jurisdiction over water power. In the first place, it is a national problem, and the States are not competent to deal with it. Then, the principal sources of water power come from navigable streams, which are under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and from the streams in the national forests and in the public domain. For many years it was contended that the Federal Government had no control over water power on navigable streams, but this has been overthrown by the Supreme Court decision in the Chandler-Dunbar case.

This decision states that in the regulation and development of navigable streams "the United States is a single Government, and as to that governmental function there are no States. When, where, and how power inherent in navigable streams shall be utilized is a legislative question for congressional determination."

As far as the right of the Federal Government to control the water power on the national forests and public domain is concerned, it has never been successfully questioned.

The fact that Congress is now considering the Adamson bill, providing for control of water power on navigable streams, and the Ferris bill, covering water power on public lands, is evidence of the acceptation of the Government's right to act in the matter. The right being admitted, the vitally important point is the principles underlying these measures.

Regardless of the frenzied but feeble arguments of privilege-seeking interests and their defenders, the ownership must be vested in the Government or there can be no effective control of rates and service to the public. Any successful attempt to advance the common welfare must be predicated on such possession. Switzerland, the little nation which has come nearer to realizing a pure democracy and government by the people than any other in the world, has learned this lesson and profited by it. There is no coal in the country, every pound used being imported. But the mountain torrents, rushing down steep declivities, furnish the power which may be easily generated into electricity. Years ago keen-eyed capitalists saw the value of this power and started in to secure the water-power sites for their own enrichment. They were rapidly securing a monopoly, when patriotic citizens saw the danger of such efforts. They began an organized protest by calling the attention of the people to the menacing power which was vested in those who controlled the only source of mechanical energy in the country.

The Federal Congress refused to act, however, and the citizens drafted an initiative petition for an amendment to the national constitution, providing for the nationalization of water power. In Switzerland the people really rule, and no Congress can defy their will. Whenever 50,000 Swiss voters sign an initiative petition for an amendment, the proposed measure must be put to a vote of the people, and the decision of the people is law.

The water-power amendment was signed by twice as many voters as necessary, and then the Federal Congress became interested, for when representatives of the people know that the people themselves can nullify their refusal or neglect to act, they are very anxious to carry out the people's will. The Federal Congress went a step further than the people and proposed an amendment still more comprehensive. This was accepted by the citizens, it was voted upon, and overwhelmingly carried. Switzerland to-day owns her water power. She encourages development by private enterprise, but the sources of power remain with the people, and the Federal legislation controls every feature of the development, transmission, and sale of electrical energy.

This action by the people of Switzerland to save her "white coal" is only the action which would be taken by any intelligent people. Would anyone dare say that if America were far enough advanced in popular government to have the right of initiative and referendum the verdict here would be different from that of the Swiss citizenship? The man who so declares argues that the American people are blind and idiotic, and that instead of controlling the water-power trust they would rather have the water-power trust control America.

The American people are awake to the dangers of private ownership and control of water power. The awakening has come within recent years, but this is a question of recent years. The power of that enlightenment may be seen in the changes made in this measure.

The first draft of the Adamson bill was a complete nullification of all the principles of a sound water-power policy. The changes which have been made mean a decided improvement in some particulars, but even in its amended form it means a step backward instead of forward. The provision for altering and amending the act will have the virtual effect of giving perpetual rights to water companies. The bill is apparently founded on the principle of encouraging private enterprises to develop water power and for the sake of that development to sacrifice the public interest.

Whatever virtue there may be in prompt development there is still more need to protect the rights of the people. It would be better to suffer delay than to take action now which would close the doors to effective efforts to benefit the public and advance the common good in the future.

The provisions for return to the Government at the expiration of a definite time are also such as will render it easy for private water companies to hold control indefinitely. The purchase plan is involved with many difficult if not impossible provisions.

The measure as it now stands does not square with the demands of an enlightened citizenship and should be defeated. Its passage will mean that private interests will have undue power to control rates, and that the organizations of municipalities over the country will have great need to fight against unjust charges and undue advantages on the part of these power companies over the people.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, on July 22 there appeared in the local newspapers of this city and in most of those published in New York an article purporting to be a description of a petition said to have been sent to the President and to Members of Congress by the annual convention of the United States Spanish War Veterans. This petition, it is alleged in the article, asserts that "more than 500 Spanish-American War veterans employed in the Philippines have either been ruthlessly dismissed or have had their salaries reduced since Francis Burton Harrison became Governor General." It therefore requests "that * * * whenever it is desired to fill a position now occupied by a discharged soldier, sailor, or marine with a Filipino, or where it is desired to abolish altogether such position for economic reasons, the occupant of such position be transferred to a similar position in the service of the United States, either here or at home."

I have no concern, Mr. Chairman, with the recommendation for transfers of veterans to places in the civil service of the United States. That is a question of your domestic policy already amply provided for, but with which I should not presume to attempt to meddle in any event. But I am deeply and directly concerned with the aspersions upon the conduct of Governor General Harrison which are contained in the press report. Secretary of War Garrison has prepared and given out a statement upon this subject, which, together with the newspaper article, I ask leave to print in connection with my remarks.

This is the newspaper article:

[From the Washington Post, July 22, 1914.]

VETERANS' JOBS GONE—500 HIT BY PHILIPPINE POLICY SEND PLEA TO WASHINGTON—CIVIL-SERVICE LAW IGNORED—PETITION TO CONGRESS AND PRESIDENT PUTS BLAME ON RETRENCHMENTS OF GOV. GEN. HARRISON—WANT WRONGS RECTIFIED—ASK FOR TRANSFERS TO THE UNITED STATES.

[Special to the Washington Post.]

NEW YORK, July 21.

More than 500 Spanish-American War veterans employed in the Philippines have either been ruthlessly dismissed or have had their salaries reduced since Francis Burton Harrison became Governor General, according to a petition which has been sent to the President and to the Members of the Senate and the House. A number of the men affected, the petition avers, have families to support. Those affected run from bureau chiefs to teamsters, and from architects to road foremen. Their places have been filled by Filipinos. The government, the petition says, has stultified the so-called Philippine civil-service act.

The petition was ordered sent to Washington by the annual convention of the department of the Veteran Army of the Philippines, United Spanish War Veterans, and it asks that relief be afforded at once.

CABLED NOT TO RETURN.

It asserts that upon the cessation of hostilities, 16 years ago, inducements were offered to cause the veterans to continue in their places, and a civil-service law was enacted which tended to insure permanency of employment.

"With the coming of the new administration," the petition reads, "there was inaugurated a policy of retrenchment. As an outcome, many honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, some of them past the prime of life, were separated from the service without cause; others were reduced in compensation without notice. Many thus affected were at home on well-earned vacations, and were notified by cablegram that they need not return to the islands.

ASK FOR TRANSFER OF MEN.

"The veterans ask that the matter of the separation of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines from Government employ be investigated, and that the wrong done such persons be rectified at the earliest practicable date; and that in the future, whenever it is desired to fill a position now occupied by a discharged soldier, sailor, or marine with a Filipino, or where it is desired to abolish altogether such position for economic reasons, the occupant of such position be transferred to a similar position in the service of the United States, either here or at home."

Secretary Garrison's statement is as follows:

I notice in the papers of yesterday a statement purporting to proceed from the Spanish-American War Veterans in the Philippines, alleging unfair treatment of veterans who have been in the Philippine service by the Philippine Government. I say "purporting," because the communication has not come to us officially, and it may be that it is an error to attribute the statement to the Spanish-American War Veterans.

In some of the papers the headlines state that as many as 500 Spanish-American War veterans have been let out since the new administration took charge, and other similar statements appear in other papers. This whole statement is so wide of truth that I desire to state the facts. My reason is not merely to correct this particular misstatement, but to bring to the attention of the public a widespread, thoroughly organized, and vigorous propaganda of misstatement of facts concerning the Philippine Islands and the governmental administration thereof. I am not in the least resentful of any sort of criticism anybody feels called upon to make concerning our relations to the Philippines and what we are doing or hope to do therein, but I do feel that the public should be warned and cautioned against accepting as facts these conscious and purposeful misstatements.

Very recently there have been conspicuous examples showing that there is a design to mislead the public and make it very difficult to treat the subject from the proper point of view.

But recently it was reported that there had been a great increase in the death rate and much more sickness than ever before in the islands, owing to the fact that Dr. Heiser had been supplanted. The fact is that Dr. Heiser has not been supplanted; at the time that the publication appeared he had not even left the islands, although he had been granted leave of absence. Another report stated that the new government had let out 15 American heads of divisions in a particular bureau. The fact is that there were only three heads of divisions in the bureau, and one of them had resigned.

In this particular instance, concerning the Spanish-American War veterans, the facts are as follows:

I have before me, loaned by a periodical, an unsigned, unauthenticated, printed folder purporting to be a copy of resolutions adopted by the Department Veteran Army of the Philippines at its convention held at Baguio, Philippine Islands, April 8 to 12, 1914. It contains no allegation that 500 veterans of the Spanish War had been let out of the service, though the statement is made therein that almost 500 Americans had been forced out of the service within four months. And this statement is made in such a way as to mislead, apparently, a good part of the press.

As a matter of fact, when Gov. Gen. Harrison, himself a veteran of the Spanish War, reached the Philippine Islands the number of Spanish War veterans in the Philippine civil service was very small. There had been a time when the majority of the American civil employees of the Philippine government were veterans of the Spanish-American War and the insurrection in the Philippines, but in 1903 617 Americans voluntarily left that service and 269 left involuntarily, a total of 886, or 32 per cent of the American personnel. In 1904 787 Americans left voluntarily and 313 involuntarily, a total of 1,100, or 34 per cent of the American personnel. In the later comparisons I shall only refer to subsequent years, when the entire number of Americans in the Philippine service was kept at approximately 2,600.

On Gov. Gen. Harrison's arrival there was in the civil service of the Philippine Islands, and had been for a number of years, a continuously changing body of Americans, maintained at approximately 2,600. Of these Americans for the eight preceding years approximately 500 each year had voluntarily withdrawn from the service. The number leaving in the past year has been slightly greater, due to necessary retrenchment. For the seven months ending April 30, which included the first seven months of Gov. Gen. Harrison's administration of the Philippine Islands, 497 Americans had left the service. Of this number 302 had resigned voluntarily, 144 had left the service due to reduction of force, 12 had resigned for various reasons at the request of the Governor General, 18 had been dropped for unexplained leave of absence, 4 had died, and 17 had been discharged for various reasons under the civil-service laws.

It should be noted that in 1905 and 1906, when an effort was made at retrenchment, 1,275 Americans left the civil service of the Philippine Islands in two years, so that there has been nothing remarkable in the number of Americans that have left the Philippine civil service for all causes since the arrival of Gov. Gen. Harrison in the Philippines.

Now as to the number of these leaving the service who are Spanish War veterans and of the unfair treatment which they have subsequently received. On January 10, 1914, the director of the civil service of the Philippine Islands prepared for the Governor General a list showing the ex-soldiers, ex-sailors, and ex-marines who had been dropped from the Philippine civil service since his arrival on account of reduction of force. This included a total of 22, not half of whom were Spanish War veterans. Of this number 4 have been transferred to the United States civil service in the islands and 6 were transferred to the United States civil service at home. This total of 10 who were transferred to the civil service included every man on the list who applied for a transfer. Other changes have taken place since January 10, but this quite fully illustrates the small number of veterans affected thereby and the subsequent treatment which they had received.

In fact, it is well known to all persons who have been for any length of time in the Philippine civil service that we have the most liberal provisions governing their transfer to the United States civil service. Heretofore, this has required three years' service in the Philippine Islands, but in order that no man might be prejudiced due to the reduction in the American force found necessary in the Philippine Islands, President Wilson has reduced this period to two years in cases of persons who have been deprived of positions in the Philippines by reduction of force.

The facts further are that no employees in the Philippines have been discharged by Gov. Harrison except in accordance with law and the civil-service regulations and in the manner customarily followed heretofore in the islands.

This department certainly has no grievance against ex-soldiers petitioning for consideration, but such petition should be based on facts and not be susceptible of use in a campaign of misrepresentation and falsehood.

I give attention to this particular misrepresentation because I feel so strongly that we have a very difficult duty to perform in the Philippines, and that it only can be properly performed in the event public opinion in this country proceeds upon the facts as they are and not upon willful misstatements thereof, which can only serve to misdirect and mislead opinion and judgment.

Before I refer to Secretary Garrison's statement in greater detail, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I have the highest respect for the veterans of the Spanish-American War as such, and that I am certain my people entertain toward them a similar feeling. They answered the call not only of their country but of free government in general when they enlisted for the liberation of the Cuban people who were then struggling for their national existence against the tyranny of Spain. It was an unforeseen turn of events that brought them to the Philippines, but there as in Cuba they fought the Spaniards in the cause of liberty, cooperating with the Filipinos who, like the Cubans, were in open revolt against the tyrannical rule of foreigners. That these veterans—enlisted in the cause of freedom—were subsequently compelled to turn their weapons against the Filipinos, their former allies and friends, was in no sense their fault. Ordered by their Government to subdue the Filipino people, they, as good soldiers, had no choice but to obey the command. When peace had been reestablished and civil government introduced, it was natural that many of these soldiers should enter the civil service. There they have received from the Philippine Government every consideration, and the generosity displayed toward them has been warmly approved by the Filipino people. Many of them have been numbered among the useful public servants of the insular government, and as such they have received full and due recognition. There is nothing but good feeling toward them among the inhabitants of the Philippines.

It is this state of affairs that has controlled the management of the Philippine civil service, as Secretary Garrison amply and ably shows in the statement I have just submitted to you. What he has said has been written with absolute knowledge of the whole situation. It is inspired by no partisan motive. The affairs of the Philippine Government are managed in the War Department through the Bureau of Insular Affairs; and at the head of that bureau is a general of the United States Army, himself a veteran of the Spanish-American War and a consistent friend of every American who has rendered good service in the Philippine Government. Gen. McIntyre, to whom I refer, has, moreover, been in charge of that bureau since President Taft's administration, and was for many years before he assumed charge an active factor in its management, besides having seen long service in the Philippines. We may count with absolute certainty upon the reliability of the data he has furnished the Secretary of War and which form the basis of the latter's statement.

But, more than this, I can assure the Members of this House that Secretary Garrison himself has, since his appointment as Secretary of War, adopted and consistently pursued the policy of dealing with Philippine affairs upon an absolutely nonpartisan basis. He has deliberately avoided making criticisms of the former administration of the islands, although there was an ample field for a just and strong denunciation of both Republican officials and Republican policies. I speak with knowledge and conviction when I say that he desires to deal with Philippine affairs from the moral standpoint and to dispose of them on a basis of justice. Take note, further, that Secretary Garrison's statement is sweeping and inclusive. He refers to this alleged petition in behalf of the Philippine veterans merely as one item in a campaign of misrepresentation directed against Gov. Harrison, himself long a distinguished Member of this House. That such a campaign is in progress, animated by malicious motives and conducted through the circulation of artful appeals to prejudice and baseless assertions as to facts I firmly believe. It should be enough, in answer to such calumnies, to call to mind Mr. Harrison's past record here. You are all familiar with his great ability, his high character, and his love for righteousness. He is honoring both this House and his country by his able, conscientious, and statesmanlike discharge of the duties of his high office. Let me say to you in one word that, since the beginning of the American occupation of the Philippines, no better or more efficient man has ever sat in our chief executive's chair than Francis Burton Harrison, of New York. [Loud applause.]

Because he is imbued with the spirit of genuine free Americanism he has the love of the Filipino people. If you are seeking to lead that people along the path of prosperity, progress, and individual freedom to the goal of national liberty, you have intrusted that noble enterprise to the right man. If it be your wish to subjugate the Filipinos, to exploit them, and to give their resources into the hands of a few concerns, you have placed the governorship in the hands of the wrong man, and Mr. Harrison should be recalled without delay.

I believe I understand and appreciate the real altruism that actuates the rank and file of the American people in their dealings with the Philippine Islands, and, so believing, I do not doubt that Gov. Harrison, in spite of his adversaries and detractors, will have the support of this Government and finally of the public in the performance of his duty. It is my fervent prayer, and that of all my people, that Gov. Harrison may patiently and unselfishly continue to bear the burden of his difficult task until he shall have carried through his mission and attained its complete success. That such a course involves for him only labor and hardship, whose full value will be appreciated to the full by but few of his compatriots, I am well aware; but I believe that with his ideals and high purposes he will find his compensation for personal sacrifice in the knowledge that he has advanced the cause of justice and of humanity. When the time shall come that his work in the Philippines has been accomplished Gov. Harrison can retire, should he so wish, in the full knowledge that both to his own country and mine he has rendered a service that will place his name among the immortal champions of freedom. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] such time as he desires to use. [Applause.]
